Overton's Leap.

The following story of the fate of John Over on, who sold the land on which the city of Portland, Or., now stands, has been handed down by the Indians: "After Overton left Oregon he next appeared as a trader between the Mex.cans and Indians on the frontier of Mexico. But having outrageously cheated both parties, the Indians 'shook' him, and the Mexican government, for some crime not re corded, set a price upon his head. He disappeared for a long time, but one day a party of Comanches came across him in Texas and immediately gave chase. Overton was mounted on a powerful mustang, and for a time dis-tanced his pursuers; but coming to a deep chasm, which was about twentyfive feet wide, was suddenly checked in his escape. His horse was now too exhausted to make the leap, and the Indians being out of sight behind a hill, he resolved to resort to strategy. Dismounting, he pricked his horse with his knife, causing the animal to leap over the precipice. A large hollow log lay a short distance from the edge of the chasm, into which he crept, unpreceived, as he thought, by his enemies. The Indians, however, had reached the top of the hill and saw his last movements. They rode up to the log and commenced, for his benefit, a narration of the tortures which they intended to inflict when they should catch him, and one of the party proposed having dinner on the spot. Overton's feelings may be imagined when they proceeded to light a fire within a few inches of him beside the log. His position, of course, became untenable, and he slid out, preferring to be shot rather than roasted to death. His persecutors opened fire on him, and, desperate as the chance was, he made a dash for the chasm. To the amazement of the Indians he cleared it by a foot. Un-fortunately for him, however, one foot alighted on a loose stone; he lost his balance, staggered backward, and rolled to the bottom of the chasin, where his mangled body was found beside that of his horse. The chasm bears the name to this day of 'Overton's leap."

Educated by the Newspapers.

A member of a manufacturing firm that employs 500 men told a committee of the United States senate that the knowledge he possessed he had got by reading the newspapers and not from books; and that by reading Complete Treatment with inhaler for One Dollar.

not from books: and that by the newspapers he kept himself informed on the literature and current formed on th events of the day. Thousands of other prominent business men would make the same acknowledgment if questioned on the subject. The tend-ency of all literature is toward expansion, so the most industrious reader of books can scarcely in a lifetime become well informed. Newspapers, on the contrary, condense nearly everything into as few words as possible. Were a student to attempt to give the political, social, religious and literary thought of the world for a day he might do it in far more elegant style than the newspapers, but his history would occupy the reader's time for at least a week.
