AN ARTIST'S REVENGE.

The Price Which a Belgian Miser Paid for His Picture.

Wiertz, the famous and eccentric Belgian artist who avenged himself upon the Parisians rejected one of his pictures by writing his name on a genuine Rubens and sending it to be rejected also, should not be omitted from the list of painters who have brought refractory customers to terms. The object of his vengeance was a Brussels notary. The artist rarely made the concession of painting a sitter, but he fell in love with the visitor's face on first sight. The notary was bald, his forehead heavily wrinkled; two piercing eyes looked out from under bushy eyebrows; the nose had a cimeter's curve, and the mouth was like the edge of a sabre; the cheeks were flat and colorless, and the chin was pointed; all the face was cleanly shaven, angular, keen, and the professional white cravat gave it a touch impossible to describe but easy to imagine.

While the notary was explaining his desire to patronize art by ordering his portrait, Wiertz was coming his visitor's features and getting his striking face by heart. When, however, Van Speck, N. P., learned that the price would be ten thousand francs, he rose brusquely, and took his hat. "Pray sit down," said the artist, soothingly. "That is my usual price, but as I am interested in your face, and have an ardent desire to paint it, I shall be willing to make more favorable terms. What will you give?"

The notary named a ridiculously inadequate sum. The artist rejected the offer warily, and a long bargaining ensued, during which Wiertz obtained the study he had coveted of the face, with its every lineament bearing the notary's ruling passion of gain.

At last a bargain was closed for three thousand francs, and Wiertz bade his patron adieu, announcing that he would shortly make an appointment for a sitting.

So soon as the man of parchments had departed Wiertz leaped to his easel, and feverishly set to work on the portrait which he had in his mind. Rapidly and surely the picture came out upon the canvas till, when night fell, from the dark background Van Speck, N. P., looked out upon the spectator, caught to the life, leaning his cadaverous face on one long, lank hand, while on the table before him were books, parchments, deeds, and all the apparatus of the notary's study. Next morning he gave the finishing touches to the picture, put it in a case, and calling a porter, bade him take it to the notary's house and await an answer.

In about an hour the porter returned.

"The gentleman," he reported, had the case opened in the hall, and looked at the picture. He said nothing, but he made a face and shook his fist. Then he went up stairs, and presently he sent down the canvas, and said I was to take the picture back. You owe me four francs."

Wiertz took the note, which read as follows: "SIR: I desired a portrait, and you have sent me a thing which bears no resemblance whatever to my face. I return it, and beg that all communication between us may cease."

Wiertz placed the picture on his easel, and in a few hours had completely changed it, especially as to the accessories. The eyes now evaded the gaze, the lips were more closely drawn, the look in the nose became more pronounced, the chin more severe. The background became a dungeoned wall with a grated window, and in lieu of the notary's "properties" appeared a heavy stool, a watering can, a monthly crust and a bundle of lamp straw. This done, the artist boldly signed his picture, placed in the frame a large ticket - "In prison for debt" - and put it in a dealer's window.

The next day, as a friend of the notary's was passing the shop, he stopped for a view of the picture. Great heavens! five minutes afterward he was in the notary's office, four minutes later the notary was before the dealer's window, and in three minutes more he bounded into the artist's studio.

"Sir-r-r!" hissed the notary. "There is an exhibition at this moment a picture which is making me the laughing-stock of all Brussels. You will have the picture removed instantly - immediately; do you understand?"

"I do not. There is a picture of mine on exhibition, but I really can not see what earthly concern of yours."

"But, sir, it is my portrait."
"You are in error, sir. I agreed to paint your portrait for three thousand francs, and thinking to give you an agreeable surprise, I painted it from memory. I thought the picture toward a good one, but you dismissed me of my illusion, and indeed I have your written authority for declaring that there is not the slightest resemblance to you. The picture was returned upon my hands, and so I had no option but to endeavor to dispose of it."

"Well," said the notary, after a long pause, "rather than have any scandal about it, I will stand in your bargain and take your picture. Here are the three thousand francs."
"Pardon me," retorted the artist, "I could not think of parting with it for less than fifteen thousand francs."
"Fifteen thousand francs! Good morning, sir!"

But when Van Speck, N. P., had rushed out into the street, and saw the crowd around the dealer's window in the distance grown larger during his visit to the artist, he reflected, and presently he returned to the studio.

"I have thought it over," he said, "and have concluded to accept your offer. I will take it at fifteen thousand francs."
"Pardon me," said the artist, "but I have been thinking it over, too, and I have an idea. The picture has made a sensation, and I think that the more it is seen the greater that sensation will become. Now, how do you think it would take if I were to leave it on show for another fortnight, and then send it round Brussels on a porter's back, and get up a popular lottery for the picture at five francs a ticket? I don't think I should have any difficulty in disposing of six thousand tickets, which would give me thirty thousand francs. Thirty thousand francs is the lowest price I could think of accepting for my masterpiece, and the longer I think over the lottery idea the more I like it."

With tears in his eyes the notary wrote a check for thirty thousand francs, twenty-seven thousand francs of which the artist next day turned over to the local charities. Then, having obtained the artist's order, he rushed to the dealer's, carried the picture home, and in a frenzy of fury danced upon it, tore it with his teeth and nails into a handful of painted shreds, and crammed it into the grate.

It is known that two people do not see the same thing alike, and consequently explain it differently. They do not hear the same statement alike, and they always repeat it with variations. Of all witnesses the eye is the least trustworthy. It appears to be the most subject to delusions. There is a reason for all this. No two persons have eyes alike. The two eyes in one head are seldom alike; if they match in color they are different in form, different in focus. Not one eye in 10,000,000 is in a normal, perfect condition. The focus is either behind the retina, or in front of it, and the eye is either near-sighted or far-sighted. What can be expected of such an organ in the way of correct observation. It appears to be still worse with the ear. It is at best a crooked organ, and nearly everything that passes through it gets a twist. And these two defective machines are allied with probably the most deceitful little member that ever was, the tongue. The effort of the tongue to put into sound and speech the so-called impression obtained through the complicated mechanism of the eye and the ear is a ludicrous affair. Any one who is familiar with a court of justice or neighborhood talk knows that.

Sale of Oregon Stock at the East.
WASHINGTON, Aug. 20. - G. W. Talbot and F. Breeding, two stock raisers of Oregon, had seventy-five fine Oregon mares on sale at Redesecker's drove yard at Baltimore yesterday. Of the seventy-five, forty-four were sold, the prices ranging from $35 to $82.50. The mares were all young and in excellent condition, unbroken and fiery. There were buyers present from all parts of Maryland. Most of the animals were bought by private parties, the dealers getting but few. The remainder of the seventy-five were taken on to Philadelphia last night, where there were sold to-day, bringing about the same prices, though in a few cases somewhat more. About fifty Texas ponies were sold here last week at about $85 each on an average.
