An Anecdote of Whittier.

It is related of John G. Whittier, "the Quaker poet," that people used to come to him in their grief and trouble, and that to more than one soul he has given relief.

"And so thee really thinks thee will go to hell?" said Mr. Whittier, after listening to a tale of torment. "Oh, I am sure of it," cried the sufferer "Does thee hate thy fellow-men?" asked Mr. Whittier. "No, no," said his unhappy friend. "Don't thee hate God, then?" came the next question. "I love him," was the answer, "whatever happens to me." "Don't thee hate God, who would send thee to hell, and let others, who thee know have led worse lives, go to heaven?" "No; I am glad of every one that is saved, even if I am to be a castaway." "Now, what does thee think the devil will do with thee? How can he use thee—one who loves the God that condemns him to torment, one who loves his fellow-men, and would keep them out of the clutches of Satan—how can the devil employ thee or endure thee?" New light dawned upon the darkened vision of the wretched man. It was a sermon he needed. The poet became preacher, and when it becomes known that from that moment the man resumed his old time cheer after a hearty laugh over his morbid terrors, it can be seen that his preaching actually produced a change most potent and wonderful.

A Texas Dinner Station.

The run from San Antonio to El Paso, 618 miles, is, for the most part through an almost treeless waste, apparently unfit for any profitable use. The dinner station is an old passenger coach gutted of its seats and side tracked in the middle of this desert. The fell forage for the inner man is manipulated by an almond-eyed Celestial, a graduate from some celebrated hash house. The cuisine is prepared on the platform at one end of the car. Of all the passengers who sat down at the Mongolian board, but one, and he a Texan with a liberal supply of tarantula juice, had the temerity to attack the comestibles. I left him tugging with tooth and nail, at a fragment of some tough, nameless tissue, and swearing: "I'll eat this owl if it breaks my neck." And I think it was owl.

Probably the smallest and most unique postoffice in the world is a barrel, which swings from the outermost rock of the mountains overhanging the Straits of Magellan, opposite Terra del Fuego. Every passing ship opens it to place letters in it or to take them out. Every ship undertakes to forward all letters in it that is possible for it to transmit. The barrel hangs by its iron chain, beaten and battered by the winds and storms, but no locked or barred office on land is more secure.
