China, like all conservative nations, sinks slowly into decay. Its condi-tion resembles that of Italy in the last century under an intense despotism, or England in the days of the Plantagenets. Its cities, that to Marco Polo seemed the centers of the highest luxury and taste, are now less carefully built and tended than the cities of Mexico and Peru. Its roads that in the early period of our era were paved with stone and bound to-gether its different provinces—wonderful creations of human labor—are now sunk into miserable tracks, still climbing hill and mountain, but dangerous and neglected. Throughout the immense empire, larger than the United States, the means of communication are so imperfect that it takes several months to pass from the China sea to the highlands of Thibet. The roads are impassable. It is a mental decay that has chiefly prevented the progress of the Chinese. The conception of freedom and of inde-pendent thought has never reached them. Their literature is the servile production of minds that never venture to dispute the supremacy of the Son of Heaven. The poets and philosophers seem always on their knees before their despots. Like the Per-sian, the Arab, and the Egyptian, the Chinese have never striven to throw off the lead of the service and he from off the load of tyranny and be free, and hence their slow decay. They have lost even their own invention s. The China of to-day is far behind the China of Marco Polo. Its great canal is a ruin, its civil service a source of corruption. its schools the schools of the middle ages, its immense population the prey of the adventurous nations of the west. The Chinese have even lost the art of working in porcelain, and the rare china that was once the model of England and Holland can no longer be produced among them. The poets of the earlier ages were sometimes soft and tender; the modern poetry of China has declined like its porcelain. It is said that e ven the tea of China has lost its early excellence. Only the "ordinary tea," Capt. Gill relates, is found in tea-houses. Only once or twice he meets with the pure yellow beverage that has no parallel.
