Contrary to general expectation, Gen. Newton will not be down on the Cascades this morning, as at first arranged. He sails for San Francisco on the Columbia to-morrow morning.

It is now considered very probable that Mayor Chapman of Portland will be indicted by the grand jury for alleged sins of omission and commission, which the Oregonian exposed thirteen months ago.

The Scandinavian Blaine and Logan club had a large and enthusiastic meeting at the Columbia Canning Co.'s premises yesterday evening. The meeting was addressed by C. W. Fulton and others. W. H. Effinger speaks at Occidental hall this evening and J. Q. A. Bowlby at the Blaine and Logan wigwam.

Through Geo. P. Wheeler, the Astoria Brass Band presented Joe Langdon with a flute and piccolo last Sunday evening. He goes on the Wm. H. Starbuck as first officer. By the way there is quite a group of Astoria firemen going on that vessel. Langdon, Wilson, Blake, Arrigoni, Wallace, and one or two more. They have a good deal of amateur talent among them and will doubtless have many a pleasant hour—especially from 50 to 50.

In the Portland case of Nelson Bennett vs. the Northern Pacific Express Co., a motion by defendant for judgment, notwithstanding the verdict, was filed and overruled Saturday, by Judge Smith. Judgment on the verdict was then announced in the sum of $29,886.27, together with the costs of the action. The suit was brought to recover the sum of $18,000, which was shipped by Ladd & Tilton and lost by the express company. It is said that the case will be appealed.

A Free Country.

The larger boy had a uniform cap on his head, and the smaller one carried an empty kerosene torch. As they were about to separate to "parade" around the block the larger one said: "Now, Put, you go down that way. If you meet a smaller boy than you are hurrah for any candidate you want to, but if he is the biggest don't you do any hurrahing until you find out who he hurrahs for. Then you must yell for the same man or he'll lick you."

REPUBLICAN MEETING AT UPPER ASTORIA.

Speech of Hon. C. W. Fulton.

The Blaine and Logan club met at their headquarters and marched with the Scandinavian Blaine and Logan club to Upper Astoria, where a rousing meeting was held in the second story of the Columbia Canning Co.'s premises, at half past seven last evening The meeting was called to order by E. P. Hoff, who said: "I take pleasure in introducing C. W. Fulton, who will address you on the political issues of the day. Allow me to take this occasion of saying that the Scandinavian Blaine and Logan club is a thorough and complete organization; and that as Americans we have organized to aid in the election of the Republican candidates for the presidency and vice-presidency of the United States."

Mr. Fulton was received with applause, and after paying a high tribute to the Scandinavians as a people, as a reasoning, thinking, law-abiding race who were interested in good, sound government and naturally wanted none but good men placed in high positions. It was for all to reason and judge for themselves, to do that which was best for the country; if a man did that he would do that which was best for himself.

The first question was in regard to the policy of the two parties whose leaders asked for the popular vote.

Each party had principles and platforms; had chosen their candidates and it was for his hearers to say who should get their votes—Blaine or Cleveland. What are the records of the parties? "I shall vote the Republican ticket, for I believe the country will be the better governed at the hands of the Republican party than at the hands of their opponents."

On the great absorbing question of the tariff the Republican party came squarely out for a protective tariff. American labor demands this; American prosperity requires this; it is the first duty of every American citizen to guard the interests of his own country, be he native or adopted.

The Democratic party declare for free trade; they say "we want a tariff for revenue only; throw wide the doors and let all the world compete against our manufactures." As a business proposition it can be said that the welfare of our country depends upon the prosperity of the laborer; the laborer must be protected; what brings men and women to this country except to better their condition. They come from every nook of Europe, they come and they are thrice welcome; let them come and share our prosperity, but let them swear allegiance to the stars and stripes and stand by the colors of our adopted country in upholding the party that upholds the price of labor.

No matter what business it is, it is for the interest of Americans everywhere that the price of what we produce shall be high, that we may be able to make a decent support by the labor of our hands; it is necessary that we build up manufactures here at home and thus have a home market. This is something that needs no explanation nor argument.

Passing to the records of the two parties, the speaker cited certain Democratic pamphlets in which the Republican party is accused of having given away the public lands. This is infamous demagoguery—the records show differently. Thos. A. Hendricks was in congress and voted for the first railroad grant, in company with his fellow Democrats. Of all the 150,000,000 acres granted to corporations, a large portion of it was granted the railroad companies by Democratic administrations before the Republicans came into power. Regarding the homestead act, it need but be said that a Democratic president vetoed the bill, and it was reserved for a Republican administration to give every American citizen the right to choose 160 acres of land for himself and family. The Democratic party throughout was but a reminiscence; a terrible memory of a fugitive slave law, of a day when bloodhounds tracked men and women through the swamps of the south as the unfortunate slave turned his face toward where the north star of freedom blazed.

Take the issues of the past or the present; take the history of the parties or their present attitude, it will be found that the Republican party was the party of freedom and progress: the Democrats never learned anything—or forgot anything. They say they want "a change;" probably they mean "a chance."

Take the two candidates; their record as statesmen, compare them; no language is necessary. Blaine has been the foremost figure in American politics for many years; he has been a leader in debate, has had advanced views on matters of public policy and has been honored with the highest offices in universal recognition of his services. Take Cleveland: he is a nonentity, only recently emerged from obscurity and has neither the ability to express an opinion nor the courage to maintain it. Take the vice presidential candidates. The Republicans had the soldier-statesman, John A. Logan; the Democrats had the man that counseled co-operation with the south when the nation was in the throes of a gigantic rebellion. Compare the men and vote for him who deserves best of his country. It was charged against Blaine that he was too aggressive, that his foreign policy would be too brilliant. Blaine's "aggressiveness" consists in protecting an American citizen the world over, and in proclaiming that the folds of the American flag should protect a citizen of the United States in whatever sea it floated.

The speaker then entered upon an explanation of Blaine's policy, which he showed was one of peace, a broad, pacific, humane policy that would do away with jangling and quarreling and enable all the Republics, North American and South American, to go forward to a peaceable and prosperous future.

The matter of the "Mulligan" letters was gone over and explained for the thousandth time, the business transactions that called out the correspondence being ventilated and dwelt upon.

"Now, then," said the speaker, "whom shall we vote for?" (A voice, "Blaine".) Tremendous applause. The speaker closed in a brilliant peroration, after which three cheers were given for Blaine and Logan, three more for C. W. Fulton, and the procession reforming marched back to headquarters.

Having suffered with rheumatism, Mr. Peter Stallman, Bennington Township, Iowa, says he tried St. Jacobs Oil, the marvelous pain-reliever, and was entirely cured by its use.

PACIFIC COAST FOOD FISHES

III.

THE TRUECOD—(Gadus Morrhua). Codfish. Dr. Bean, the naturalist, who investigated the fisheries of Alaska, believed that the Pacific codfish are identical with the "Gadus Morrhua" of the Atlantic, as they have the three dorsal fins separate and distinct from each other, two separate anal fins, and a small barbel under the chin. But more recent investigations have proved that there is a considerable difference between the Atlantic and Pacific cod, the latter being named by Professor Jordan, "Gadus macrocephalus."

The most noticeable difference is in the tongues and sounds, which, either salt or fresh are considered by New England people as delicacies. The eastern cod have a large sound, which when boiled is gelatinous and rich eating. The "sound" of the Pacific cod is little more than a shrivelled skin, and the tongues are tough and hard. This difference is very marked in the salted ones which are brought to Puget Sound from San Francisco, both the eastern and Pacific varieties. It only requires one trial to convince any one of the superiority of the eastern fish in this particular.

The flesh of the Pacific cod is also somewhat different from the Atlantic variety or else the style of curing causes the difference. Some of the dried codfish I have seen, although to all appearance equal to eastern cod, prove very different when cooked, being hard and tough and the consistence of horn, which no amount of boiling or steaming could make tender. This has been attributed to the lime in the salt with which they were cured, and there is a notable quantity of lime in most of the salt made on the Pacific. I have eaten of these codfish which were cured with the same kind of salt that is used by Gloucester fishermen, and they were still much harder than eastern cod.

This hardness may be occasioned, as has been suggested to me by eastern fishermen whom I have met on Puget sound, by the fish remaining too long on board of vessels "in kench," before they are dried. The codfish cured at San Francisco are taken in the Okohtsk sea and in the vicinity of the Schoumagin islands, Alaska, where the fishing vessels are engaged several months in the fisheries; then the voyage to San Francisco occupies a still longer period of time, and not unfrequently after the arrival of the vessels the fish remain on board several weeks before they are put on flakes to be dried. This long time in which the fish remain in kench causes the gurry to permeate the flesh, when it assumes the properties of fish glue, and when dried in the arid climate of San Francisco or Sancilits the fish acquire a horn like consistence which prevents their cooking tender like Atlantic cod. I have formed this opinion from my own observation, for I have seen codfish cured at Neah bay, and at Port Angelos, W. T., as soon as caught, and they were very excellent. I also saw, at Masset, Queen Charlotte islands, during the summer of 1883, codfish which had been salted at the Hudson Bay Company's Post at that place, which were caught off Masset inlet, and they were equal to eastern cod in tenderness. They were cured with Liverpool coarse fine sack salt.

The best method of curing the Pacific cod for family use is to pack them in pickle like salt salmon. This can only be done at the fishing stations, as it would not pay for vessels to pack their fish in barrels. The market has not been supplied with codfish in that shape as yet, but as soon as the taste for pickled codfish has been acquired, it will be found the most satisfactory method of treating Pacific cod until the fishermen will try and dry them near where they are caught. Objection has been urged that the climate of Alaska is too humid. But the Indians find no difficulty in curing their fish, and if it was found that the climate would not admit of curing them as hard and dry as in California, yet every fisherman knows that in order to cure codfish to perfection, it requires frequent turning and handling to let the air pass through it properly. It never should be allowed to remain in kench too long. "The more it is handled the better it will make," is an old fisherman's proverb. No fisherman of Gloucester would think of carrying his fish to South Carolina or Florida to cure them, and it is equally preposterous to take the cod of Okohtsk or Alaska to San Francisco. They can, however, be brought to Puget Sound and properly cured.

A few years ago a schooner was fitted out at Port Townsend and proceeded to Shoumagin islands, where she caught a cargo of fish which were brought back and cured in Port Townsend bay. These fish were exceptionally fine, but there was no market for them on Puget Sound, and they were sent to San Francisco, where the fish dealers' combination purchased them at their own figures, which were unremunerative, and the business was abandoned. The fact, however, was demonstrated that the climate at Port Townsend, Dungeness and Port Angeles is well adapted for curing fish, and as Puget Sound is 700 miles nearer the cod fishing banks than San Francisco, it is but reasonable to predict that ere long it will become the center of the fisheries of the North Pacific.

The Canadian government, through its department of the "Marine and Fisheries," is taking a great interest in the development of the fisheries of the province of British Columbia, and already it has been intimated that if the United States, through its fish commission, will make a move towards the fisheries of this coast, the Dominion government, or the English government, will join in making investigations from the Columbia river to Alaska, to discover the fishing grounds which must exist along the coasts, and which will prove a mine of wealth to the citizens of the whole northwestern portion of Oregon, Washington, British Columbia and Alaska.

Although, as I have shown, the Pacific cod differs from the Atlantic in the tongues and sounds, and in being a tougher fish to cook, there seems to be no difference in quantity or quality of the oil yielded by the livers, although from the comparative smallness of the Pacific cod fisheries as compared with those of the Atlantic, this industry is not at present of any importance; still the fact is worth knowing, as it may yet develop into profitable proportions.

In speaking of our cod fisheries, one thing should be borne in mind, that our citizens have paid but little attention to this valuable fish. The salmon and smaller varieties are so abundant and so easily procured, and the market so exceedingly limited, that it has not paid to go to the expense of a fishing outfit. But the waters of our coast swarm with fish, not only the cod, which we are at present discussing, but countless other varieties, one of which it will be proper to mention in connection with the "Gadus:"

CULTUS COD.

This is the "Ophiodon elongatus," called green cod, cultus cod, Buffalo cod, etc. This fish is plentiful in the waters of Fuca strait and Puget sound, and is sold by dealers in Victoria and elsewhere as codfish, which, in general appearance and markings, it somewhat resembles. But the Ophiodon differs materially. Its dorsal fin is continuous from head to tail, and all its fins are thick and gelatinous. It has no oil in its liver, but a fatty substance permeates the flesh which causes the salted and dried specimens to assume a stained or rusty appearance very detrimental to its market value. This fish, fresh, is quite equal to the true cod, but much richer. It grows to a large size, some exceptional specimens I have seen weighing 75 pounds, but the average is from 10 to 25 pounds. As a pickled fish it is excellent, but dried it is not much sought after by the epicures. This fish has powerful jaws armed with long sharp teeth and when it makes a bite it holds on with the tenacity of a bulldog. The Indians of Cape Flattery take advantage of this peculiarity and capture great numbers by trolling with a hook baited with a perch or rock fish. It has the reputation of being one of the most voracious fishes on the coast. It is not an infrequent occurrence when an Indian has caught a rock cod or a kelp fish that a cultus cod will snap at the captive fish and hold on till he is hauled into the canoe and knocked on the head with the fish club, always at the Indian's hand. The 'gadus morrhua," or true cod, is easily known by having nine fins; two pectoral, two ventral, two anal and three dorsal, and a barbel under its chin. The "ophiodon elongatus," or cultus cod, has one continuous dorsal fin and no barbel.

It seems strange that there should be so much confusion in the names of our fishes, especially the cod, and that the names of rock cod should be applied to spiny fishes of such species as the "Sebastichthys," of which the red grouper, "S. ruber," is a well known instance, as well as many other members of the "Scorpænidæ" family. Fishermen gives names of eastern fish to any new variety they see bearing any resemblance to the fish of the Atlantic; but the fish of the Pacific, as well as the forest trees, are not identical with those of the Atlantic. Our hemlock, spruce and pine differ from the hemlock, spruce and pine of the eastern states, and the so-called rock cod, mackerel and hake of our waters are as different from the eastern fish of those names as are the forest trees. If we could find some common names descriptive and easily spoken, it would be a good thing, for scientific names are not adapted for common use, and is questionable if even the inventors of new words for scientific purposes can always explain their real meaning, or why they could not have adopted something that common lips can pronounce. One of the big coarse clams of Puget Sound is loaded down with the names "Lutraria capax" (Gould, "Schizothoerus nuttalu" (Conrad), and "Tresus maximus" (Gray), and yet with all these fine names it is but a poor clam which most white persons reject.

The Makahs at Cape Flattery call the true cod "Kadati," the cultus cod "Toosh kaw," and the black cod "Beshow." My next communication will give an account of this rare and delicate fish.—James G. Swan, Ass't U. S. Fish Commissioner, in Portland Journal of Commerce.

TWENTY-NINE YEARS AGO.

Captain Keyes was in command of Company M, Third artillery, in 1855, and came up here on the old steamer California, Captain W. L. Dall, arriving off the bar about 4 o'clock on a November afternoon. "Although a fierce wind had covered the whole bar from shore to shore with a white foam, it was decided to cross at once. There was a pilot on board, and he and the captain stood together on the bridge. The head of steam was increased to secure steerage way in the billows, and we moved up against a strong ebb tide, at a fair rate of speed, until we reached about midway in the passage, when a flue collapsed, drove all the burning coals from under one of the boilers and set fire to the ship, which immediately lost headway so much that she ceased to obey her rudder. The pilot lost courage, exclaiming, 'She's a goner,' and leaped down from the bridge. Captain Dall instantly resumed command, called out to the firemen to feed the remaining fires with lard and tallow, and after a few seconds the ship began to move forward, and at the end of an hour were anchored off Astoria. When the steamer lost headway the lead showed a draft of water exactly corresponding with that of the vessel, but fortunately she did not ground. Had she struck, not a soul on board could by any possibility have been saved. Some of the soldiers came to me in terror, as they saw the pilot quitting his post, and asked what they should do. I replied, "Take hold of that hose and let us put out the fire in the hold." I carried the end down the steps as far as I could breathe, the men pumped, and in a short time the flames were extinguished. General Wool was perfectly calm, as were the other officers, but it is certain none of us ever escaped a greater danger than on that occasion; and such was the opinion of the eight or ten ship-masters who were among the passengers."—Captain Keyes' Book.
