The following, from the San Francisco Post, is as applicable to the state of Oregon as to California: No doubt but the cry will soon be raised in the land by those out in the cold, that their efforts are not duly appreciated.

The South has gained a victory at ast, and the northern Democrat is just fool enough to suppose he is going to have his share in the division of the loot. In that he is very much mistaken. The New York Democrat may get something, the balance nothing; the California Democrat less than nothing. He will not be recognized in anyway. The Scrub Heroine.

She came up the road just as the scrub cow. There was not a single line of beauty from her head to her and East Seventh street, by filling and tail. Her joints and bones stuck out grading the same to its established grade in great bunches. She was large to a wid h of sixteen feet in the center in great bunches. She was large where she should have been small, and small where she should have been large. There was no gilt-edged pedigree hanging over her. No royal blood running in her veins. Her an-cestors for a dozen generations had been scrubs, and she was surely the scrubbiest of the lot. Dogs barked at her, negro boys threw sticks at her, the Jersey heifer at the corner turned up her nose in scorn, and yet the old scrub marched patiently on through the mud to the home gate. She had been out all day trying to manufacture the family supply of milk from bitter weed, chips and mud. She reached her head over the fence and called patiently for the milker. And the milker appeared on the scene. Was it the soft and gentle milkmaid with immaculate dress and slippers, with a ribbon in her hair and a smile on her lips? Did she pet the old cow and call her "good Bess," and give her something to eat while she milked? Not to any extent A great brute of a man came down to the gate. He kicked the cow as she ran in past him. He milked her with great cruel pulls and jerks. Once away from her he got up and kicked her. When he had milked her, evidently thinking that some return was in order, he secured a club and clubbed her out of the yard. What did the old scrub do? Run away and come back? If there is any human being who would have gone back he is unworthy of his race. The old cow walked patiently down the street to bunt about her feed, and return in the morning to meet exactly the same reception. The world can hardly show true devotion. We sing the
