It has been a mystery to a great many people in Oregon, says the Vindicator how it was that Frank Prisbie, the defaulting cashier of the First national bank of Portland, got off with such a light sentence of only one year when he should have got fifteen, and why it was that the second indictment was quashed on such a trival matter, because the check did not have a dollar mark before the figures. It now comes to light, and we hear it from one who claims to know, that Frisbie had the bank officials where that Prisone had the bank our answere they could not help themselves, when they took money into consideration. It seems that it was his place to keep the books between the Northern Pacific Ex-press Company and the bank, but in do-ing this he so thoroughly mixed the ac-counts up that it was impressible for them counts up that it was impossible for them to figure out how much the company owed the bank or the bank the company. WHY HE GOT A SHORT SENTENCE.

J. W. Murray, who brutally murdered his brother-in-in-x, Aifred Jenke, in Portland, is under sentence of death. It is thought probable that Gov. Moody will commute the sentence to life imprisonment. The reason given, apart from the somber circumstances, is a funny one. It seems that Murray is an expert painter; he has done some fine freeco work in the city jail and the penitentiary officials are actually said to be trying to get him to decorate the state prison. Should they succeed it would open up some alaraming possibilities. All that a man who dreads hanging but thirsts for blood need do would be to become a specialist, a good paper hanger, or a fine penman, or a clever linguist, and demonstrate his utility, and straightway he could gratify his murderous propensities with comparative immunity. J. W. Murray, who brutally murdered is brother-in-in w, Alfred Jenke, in Portwith comparative immunity.
