ONLY ONE SURVIVOR.
 His Story of an Awful Wreck on the N. Va. Sea Coast.
 HALFAX (N. S.), Dec. 25.—The Dominion government steamer Lansdowne returned from Sable Island to-night. She was out in the great gales of Friday and Saturday, and Captain Gaifford says he never saw worse weather during his half-century's experience on this coast. He brings intelligence of the wreck of the brig A. S. H., of St. Malo, France, Captain Lemarchand, owned by Meyers & Co., of St. Pierre and Miquelon from that port to Boston with fish. The vessel left St. Pierre December 15. The gales of the 17th, 18th and 19th drove the ship near Sable Island. The west-end light-house on the island was sighted at four o'clock on the afternoon of Friday, the 19th inst. A heavy snowstorm prevailed and the wind was blowing a hurricane. A few minutes after land was made out the vessel was driven on a sand bar with great violence and immediately began to break up. She had a crew of seven men. The thermometer indicated 12 degrees below zero and the sufferings of the men were terrible. They were frost-bitten, cut, bruised and thoroughly disheartened, and death was a welcome release.
 Three of the crew were washed overboard when the ship struck, and although there was plenty of floating debris, they made no effort to save themselves and were drowned. The steward, preferring death to any further misery, ran to his berth, grabbed a razor and cut a terrible gash in his throat, reaching from ear to ear, jumped into the surf and disappeared. His body was found in the sand the next day by the coast guardsmen. Captain Lemarchand and his first mate and a sailor managed to get on the sand bank by the aid of a floating spar, but only escaped the terrors of the deep to encounter the more frightful terrors of the frost king. They could faintly discern the glimmer of a light-house three miles across the sand bar, and set out in the darkness to reach it. The sand was being driven with blinding force by the gale and dashed against the faces of the exhausted men like hailstones. Finally the captain succumbed, lay down, and despite the efforts of his equally exhausted comrades to arouse him, was in a few minutes frozen to death. The chief officer and the sailor then pressed on, but within half an hour the sailor too lay on the sand a frozen corpse. The chief officer, a powerfully built man, the only survivor, pushed on alone to the light-house. After six hours of almost indescribable suffering from frost and dashing sands, he reached the light-house—the last quarter of a mile on his hands and knees—and told the terrible tale of the wreck.
 It was then 2 o'clock in the morning. When day broke the officials started for the scene of the disaster. They found the bodies of the captain and sailor and interred them in the sand. The body of the steward was also found on the beach near the wreck. The vessel had been smashed to pieces and the debris covered the surf-beaten shore. The survivor came up on the Lansdowne.
