Two men were sitting in front of a steam coil in one of the hotels. They were of the generation of this last war. The one was an ex-judge. His war. The one was an ex-judge. His declining days have been pleasant to him, for the people of his associations have rewarded him with all that his ambition craved. He was a soldier at Shiloh and belonged to the legion that wore the blue. His companion—I took him to be such—had been on the other side at the same battle. Both men had drifted along together. Is just what its name implies; a Purely Vegetable Compound, that acts directly upon the Liver; curing the many diseases incident to that important organ, and pre-whiting the name of the march from one world to an other. They began discussing the paper by Gen. Grant and that one by Johnston. From their manner you would never have su spected that they wave talking about a battle; that they had ever seen a battle. They looked each other in the eye and the light came into their faces, and they made diagrams in the dust on the marble floor, and in the palms of their hands, and on their pantaloons. A man who had been sitting near by moved his chair up so noiselessly that his approach land not been noticed, and he had done it so respectfully that he could not have been considered an intruder, anyway. He sat listening to the story of Shilleb, big chair in the other side at the same battle. Both men had drifted along together in life until they seemed to have reached the last corner, where they stood comparing notes preparatory to the march from one world to an other. They began discussing the paper by Gen. Grant and that one by Johnston. From their manner you would never have su spected that they had ever seen a battle. They looked each other in the eye and the light can be the story of the march from one world to an other. They began discussing the paper by Gen. Grant and that one by Johnston.
