ASTORIA, OREGON: APRIL 17, 1885

A COLONIAL EMPIRE.

It is a recognized principle among English e onomists that every industrious colonist settled on Britishowned lands gives employment and sustenance to from two to four or five of the men that stay at home. While the colonies continue to inarease in population there is a con. ting the throat of the British lion? stantly increasing market for the That was about the ideal Bright and home manufactures and merchandise. and to destroy colonists, or to employ them in the unprofitable pursuit of arms, which would amount to the same thing, would be equivalent to the destruction of wealth more precious even than blood. It has, therefore, long been England's policy, when her small army needed re-enforcement, to go into the man market and buy up certain thousands of the scum of the earth, "landless resolutes to some deed of enterprise that hath a stomach in't." This was done in the time of the Crimean war, but that historic fight came to an end without the necessity of placing the morcenaries in the field. Such men can be hired in numberless thousands any day in Europe. When the seizure of Mason and Slidell from the British mail steamer Trent by Commodore Wilkes came so near creating a rupture between England and this country, Germans, eager for the bounty money that was expected to be offered, flocked over to London in great throngs to volunteer their services for the war, and the recruiting o Ec:s at Westminster were besieged with applicants for the Queen's shilling. Now, however, the British ministers have found a new and apparently exhaustless mine of military wealth in the swarming populations of India. Their use now, only partially commenced, is the solution of a complicated economical question. They make better fighting material than any white mercenaries that can be hired amid the slums of Europe; their natural occupation is fighting: they live for warfare, and the country that can give them plenty of their natural employment combined with good pay - for what is poor enough pay for the English or American soldier is a princely m untenance for the sons of the Orient-that country is sure to have faithful valiant service. Now, the colonies of England and her Indian empire, and Chinese control have not only been nearly altogether the result of wars fought for conquest and commerce sake, they are continual incentives to-war. The statesmen to whom the name Great Britain is something more than a mere geographical expression, who regard the prestige and power of their country as more important than pounds sterling, or a penny more or less on the income tax, these men know that it is to the existence and maintenance of the colonies and possessions of England that her wealth is attrib utable. Strip her to-day of Canada, the Cape, New Zealand, Australia and India, and she would have less weight in the councils of the world than Holland, or even Spain. Nay, the probability would be that the next great European war would be between the remaining first-class powers for the possession of the British Isles. Looking at it in this way, the governing classes of England, certainly so far as material comforts and free dom of life are concerned are the most fortunate class on the globe; these men have always been prompt to resent insult, ready to fight on any or no provocation, and determined to uphold the honor of their flag and the terror of their name wherever ship could sail or battalion march. Dis aster to individual expeditions have but aroused to further and greater exertions and still more vast expenditures of blood and treasure. And why? Simply because these statesmen could see and understand that lack of prestige would mean loss of trade; that national henor trailed in the dust meant a speedy and ruinous reluction o' commercial gains. "I would," said Mr. Bright once at a public meeting in Newcastle, "I would that the British lion wer dead ou'right," wherein Mr. Bright slow d himself as short sighted a a one-sided politician can possibly be. Both his and Mr. Cobden's idea of a paradisiac England was the conversion of the land into one huge factory for the production of Manchester cottons and Birm ngham clocks; their sole guage of the merits or demerits of this or that line of policy, the question of its present cost. Armies cost money, so do ships of war, and guns and gunpowder and bayonets and all location. Apply to C. S. CUNDERSON. money, so do ships of war, and guns the other unpleasant implements man has invented for the shedding of blood. Therefore, it would be much ships to the benighted people who still take delight in war, and turn all the soldiers and sailors into artisans and fishermen. Guns might, of course, still be made to sell, just as in Birmingham they manufacture idols for the heathen, and send them out to the South Seas or the African coast in the same vessels with the missionaries, thus insuring the latter with plenty of material to preach against. But guns for a British army, pooh! What need of an army? Are they not all a nation of contented shop-keepers whose last of slaughter was in cut-Cobden preached forty years ago: that was something like the condition that was predicted when 1851 ushered the first international exhibition, the harbinger of perpetual peace, as it was fondly deemed to be.

Suppose such an absurd picture were possible of realization, this is about the view taken of it by the governing classes before alluded to; "If we lose our military strength; if we lose our military reputation; if the rest of the world become thoroughly convinced that we will not fight upon any provocation whatever, how long should we retain our colonies? And, with the colonies gone, some into the possession of one or other of the nations that will fight, how much of our trade would remain to keep the factories that the followers of Cobden would establish in the place of army and navy in active operation?"

ACCORDING to the London World, Canon Farrar, one of the most eminent men in the church of England. rejects completely the popular ideas in regard to the inspiration of the Scriptures, and says that the doctrine of verbal, plenary inspiration of every book, and every verse and every word in the Bible is a yoke around the pecks of Christian people, "a post-reformation dogma utterly un tenable, the daughter of an unspiritual superstition and the mother of a casuistical tyranny."
