Manning's office is crowded with anxious people. The office seekers look upon Saturday, when the secretary receives no callers, as the day when all the petitions that have been poured in during the week are considered, and on Monday they crowd in to get the results. Great pressure in to get the results. Great pressure, too, is brought by some of the clerks to secure their retention. The secretary is most perplexed by the women. They are the most importunate applicants for office, and on the other hand those who are in present the most pitiful petitions for retention. In some cases where dismissals have been contemplated, the secretary is met by the appeals of whole families who are dependent upon the salary of one woman. one weman.
