ASTORIA, OREGON:

SUNDAY, AUGUST 9, 1885

THE POINT OF VIEW.

"All good men agree far more than they disagree." This is an old saying, and a most true one. It is as true in religion as in anything else. One seldom falls into conversation with a thoroughly earnest and sincere man of whatever denomination, without being impressed with the fact that, however much men may differ as to methods, as to this or that special dogma, on all the great practical issues of life they are one. He believes in honesty and you believe in honesty. He believes in temperance, kindness, in doing good, and, however far you may fail in practice, in your heart, at least, you too, believe in these things. Human nature is much the same the world over. The human soul, with its wants and wishes, its struggles, its defects, its aspirations, its self-chidings, its relaxations, its longings, its darkness and divineness, is much the same. As the sun lit summit of a mountain rises above the mists which envelop its base, so above the fog of opinion the human soul rises; and peak speaks to peak along the whole chain. What are the churches working for? This, above all things: that God's will be done on earth as it is in heaven. That is their aim, certainly their ideal aim, however much they may fail in attaining it. Through devotional roads, to the same goal, to the same summit. We all hope to meet at the top, though some of us are following the old paths, and some of us are searching for new ones, and some of us, perhaps, have lost our way entirely, and have only the sight of the summit to guide us in our struggle up the mountain side. Why not, then, it is argued, let each man go his own way, so long, at least, as in some way he is struggling upward and not falling back?

Denominational preaching is sometimes distasteful, even to those who may agree with the preacher. For it is apt to emphasize differences, and make men seem enemies when they know they are friends. It is sport for outsiders, who enjoy the quarrel, careless of the issue. It is almost certain to be misunderstood by the thoughtless, the superficial, the superstitious, the narrow minded. It is caught up by narrow minded people of all sects and of no sect, and made the outlet for all manner of prejudice and personal spite. Men see in this world just what they have the power of seeing, and they will read everything with their own eyes; and a man is interpreted not wholly according to what he really teaches, but half, at least, after the power of the interpreter. Few men have the power of perfectly comprehending or perfectly reporting. Speaking to most men is like looking into a convex or concave mirror, which always gives back a distorted image. So true is this that it often becomes a reformer's most earnest prayer to be saved from his disciples. For a man can easily endure being misunderstood and misrepresented by his enemies, but how hard to be continually misinterpreted by our friends!

Churches and religion are oftentimes confounded in the minds of those who think they are one and the same. Churches are aids, necessary adjuncts as the aqueduct, the waterpipe, is for the life giving liquid that flows refreshingly through it.

A PENNY SAVED.

MAKING and spending, saving and hoarding—these keep the world busy. The boards last only for a lifetime, and usually take wing when they fall to the next of kin. Then the process of making begins again, and it depends on the nature of the individual whether the hard-earned dollars go into the old stocking and the savings bank or whether they find their way into circulation by ready expenditure. There is danger in both paths. Thrift carried to the extent of niggardliness is only less contemptible than lavishness which oversteps honesty.

The virtue of living within one's means is classed among "minor morals," but it often takes real pluck to do it. In this country, especially, where people are each other in arithmetical progression, the temptation to outrun one's income is incessant. "A man's a man for a' that" is all very well in poetry and song; and the sentiment is, perhaps, helpful to the honest man in jeans, who cannot afford broadcloth. But, in prose, everyday life, the clothes, the house, the living, are made the tests by which to judge a man. Fight it all we may, the fact remains, senseless and rasping as it is.

* There is no surer way of saving the pennies than by paying honest debts. Because, if one pays as he goes, he cannot exceed his income.

Wants are modified, and luxuries are discovered. Little by little, the margin widens; and there is a chance to enlarge one's expenditures or one's bank account, or one's charities. Thrift, honesty and generosity are quite compatible, and are a trio that fill homes with harmony.

An almanac three thousand years old, found in Egypt, is in the British Museum. It is said to be the oldest in the world. It was found on the body of an Egyptian, who had doubtless regarded it with as much reverence as he did the Egyptian Bible,—"The Book of the Dead," and indeed it is strongly religious in character. The days are written in red ink, and under each is a figure followed by three characters, signifying the probable state of the weather for that day. Like other Egyptian manuscripts it is written on papyrus. It is not in its integrity but was evidently torn up before its owner died. It clearly establishes the date of the reign of Rameses the Great, but contains nothing else of value.

STEAMERS going through the Suez canal must stop whenever the pilot gives the word; and when the sun goes down, no matter where the vessel is, whether at a "station" or not, it must tie up at the bank. There is no risk in this, as no other steamer will attempt to go on after sundown. The pilots are a fine set of men, of different nations—English, French, Greek, Italian, etc. They dress in a simple uniform, something like naval officers in undress.
