ROYAL BLOOD OF ENGLAND.

The Looseness and Licentiousness of the Modern Royal Family.

It would be hard for any one to trace back to the beginning of licentiousness in the higher classes of England. Sir Walter Scott based the novel of "Ivanhoe" upon the licentiousness of the Norman conquerors of England towards the Saxon ladies of high birth with whom they came in contact. The Stuarts, after the restoration, regarded no man's family as exempt from insult. The Hamoverians came to the throne attended by their mistresses from Germany, and by the time that George IV saw his numerous progeny grow up, licentiousness beginning there became the social model of the state.

The head of the British aristocracy is the crown, and there are over forty families of the aristocracy privileged to quarter the royal arms upon their shields as being of this family connection. George III had 15 children by his wife of Mecklenburg. After numerous attacks of insanity he entirely lost his mind in 1811, though he did not die for nine years. His son, the Prince of Wales, George IV, divorced his wife before he came to the throne, on the ground of her adultery with her domestics, generally Italians. He had mistresses after mistresses, and his first wife, in morals, was an excellent woman, Mrs. Fitzherbert, a widow, of whom it is on record that after the prince deserted her he persecuted her for years to get her settlement in money away from her and to obtain her letters.

Frederick, the Duke of York, next brother of George the IV was described in Greville's diary as the only one of the princes who has the feelings of an English gentleman. He delights in the society of men of the world and in a life of gayety and pleasure. He is very easily amused and particularly with jokes full of coarseness and indecency. The next brother of this family, the Duke of Clarence, took Mrs. Jordan, an actress, for a mistress, and had by her a very large family called Fitz Clarence, all of whom were put into official positions—either the church, navy or state. He had the barbarity to turn his poor mother of his children adrift in her old age, and she died of starvation in France. The next brother of this family, the Duke of Kent, father of Queen Victoria, has had his life written by a eulogist, and in a full account is given of the operations of his eldest brother, the Duke of York, who had a mistress named Mary Ann Clark, whom he permitted to imbure herself for his favors by selling military commissions, he having been the commander-in-chief of the British army. She put her own footman as a commissioned officer in the army, and the life of the Duke of Kent says: "There was hardly a department of the state which her influence had not reached, and the list of applicants entered for a consideration in her book of names to be remembered included persons of almost every station in society. The barefaced effrontery with which this sort of woman sold her calumnies against royalty would, unless borne out by documents, defy belief. For her attack on the Duke of York she stipulated to receive £5,000 cash down, besides £400 a year secured to me, my debts all discharged and a house furnished in any style of elegance I please." She asked the Duke of Kent £250 down and £150 later to let up on his pecuniaries.

The next son of the family was the Duke of Cumberland, and he, it appears, was a systematic ravisher of the ladies and wives of his friends. Greville relates under the date of 1823, a story about the Duke of Cumberland and Lady Lyndhurst, as follows: "The duke called upon her and grossly insulted her, and when, after a scramble, he was obliged to desist, and go away, but before he did, he said: 'By God, madam, I will be the ruin of you and your husband, and I will not rest until I have destroyed you both.'"

Let us now see what became of this Duke of Cumberland. Several years before the occurrence related he went to his bed about 1 o'clock in the morning, and suddenly he woke up and shouted to one of his valets in an outer room: "I am murdered!" When the valet was about to come into the room the duke again shouted: "Don't come in. The murderers are in my bedroom and they will murder you too!" When the room was searched it was found that a Corsican valet of Cumberland was lying in bed with his throat cut from ear to ear. They immediately charged the crime on this valet, who was said to have killed himself to avoid arrest. But what was the motive of the valet in cutting his own throat? Why, the duke had been using the valet's wife for a mistress, though the man had been seventeen years in his service. The valet did bestow six wounds on my royal highness. After the whole thing was settled the leading London surgeon delivered a lecture to his class, in which he said that he had examined the dead man, and that he never bestowed the wounds on the back of the neck, saying: "No man can behead himself." Now, what was the reward of this lecturer for telling the truth about a murder? The Duke of Kent, father of Victoria, heard the address, and his biographer, the Reverend Erskine Neale, says: "The Duke of Kent heard this address, and was justifi-ably indignant at its tenor. He took care that it should very speedily reach the ears of the Prince of Wales, in whose household the offending lecturer held some appointment. Soon afterwards, meeting the lecturer, whom he had previously been in the habit of greeting with great courtesy, the duke looked him fairly down, and then rapped him without mercy."

Here we see the social influence of an aristocracy extending from the summit of power down to valets, and even to medical classes. Yet this valet had been considered good enough to have the princess Augusta to be the godmother of his child, and, indeed, the whole royal family was most agreeable to him. Everybody understood that it was the royal duke who had begotten this child by the wife of his valet.

The next member of this family, the present queen's uncle, married a commoner, Lady Augusta Murray, but the act was pronounced invalid, and then the duke married Lady Underwood. By both these women he had a series of children, all bastards at law, because royalty must not marry in the kingdom, lest aristocracy become jealous. The recent "Life of George IV., by Fitzgerald, shows that the licentiousness of the brothers extended to the daughters. The princess Amelia, the youngest daughter of this family, is put down in all the books of the peerage as having died at the age of 27, unmarried. The biographer says Amelia called her father to her bedside when dying. He came with his son, the duke of Cumberland, whose behavior and conversation would have disgraced one of his own grooms. She left all her property to a friend and the matter was hushed up in the newspapers, but there is no doubt that this amiable princess was secretly married and that on her death-bed she conveyed the story to her father. Captain (afterwards general) Fitzroy was the person to whom she was thus espoused, with whom she had formed an attachment when thrown in his society at Weymouth and other places. Now, it has been confidently asserted that nearly all her sisters contracted similar alliances with persons in private stations.

It may be of moment to some of our readers to find that the princess Amelia was beguiled by Fitzroy when he was her groom, after the manner of some recent marriages in this vicinity. Sir Henry Hallford, the court physician, was ordered to give the facts to the king, who was then nearly blind. Hallford said: "Your majesty, you appointed Fitzroy to ride with the princess—you can therefore understand how the princess of Wales has bestowed her property." When old George III was insane and childish his oldest son discovered a noble lady named Pembroke who had once had an influence over him. He went and found her and brought her back to see if she could make another impression on his father, and so deprive his own mother of influence with the king.

Old Biliousness
Was a bothersome person, always quarrelsome and angry. He always misunderstood everybody, and said every body misunderstood him. Brown's Iron Bitters made direct war on Old Biliousness, and told him that he "must go." The revolution was complete. From Florence, Georgia, Dr. W. B. Prather writes: "Brown's Iron Bitters has given satisfaction in every instance I have known it used."

To cure a cold: Pour about half a pint of boiling hot water over about a dram of pulverized camphor, and inhale the vapors arising therefrom ten to twenty minutes. Great relief is at once experienced, and after two or three repetitions the discomfort is said to disappear entirely.

Red Star Cough Cure suits all ages and temperaments. Leaves no bad effects.

Boots and shoes may be rendered waterproof by soaking them for some hours in thick soap water. The compound forms a fatty acid within the leather and makes it impervious to water.

Supremely Delightful
To the emaciated and debilitated invalid is the sense of returning health and strength produced by Hosieller's Stomach Bitters. When that promoter of vigor is tested by persons in feeble health, its restorative and vitalizing potency soon evinces itself in improved appetite, digestion and nightly repose, the stomachic condition under which strength and nerve equilibrium is vouchsafed to the human system. A gain in flesh of course ensues upon the restoration of digestion and assimilation. As surely as winter follows the fall of the leaf, does disease shadow the footsteps of declining strength, when the stomach is unable to assimilate, and the body is unable to sustain itself. Marasmus, consumption and other wasting maladies are prompt to fasten upon the emaciated. Averse disease, therefore, when the grand building block, which is only renewed as fast as strength, but which counteracts the infirmities of age and those of the weather, is exhausted, consumption, malaria, liver and kidney troubles yield to it.

Are you made miserable by indigestion, Constipation, Dizziness, Loss of Appetite, Yellow skin? Shilo's Vitallizer is a positive cure. For sale by W. E. Dement.
