He was appointed by president Adams, territorial governor for Mississippi, but when it was brought to his attention that Governor Matthews had signed the Yazoo fraud act and that the senate would not confirm the appointment, he immediately with-drew it. He had notified Governor Matthews that he had sent in his name to the senate, perhaps writing, asking him if he would accept the appointment.

In time it came to Governor Matthews' ears that the president had re called his appointment and had sent in another name. Without a day's delay he packed his saddlebags, gird-ed on his sword, the one he wore in the war, and started for Philadelphia, the then seat of government, to de-mand an explanation of the treatment he had received. In three weeks he was in Philadelphia, riding into the city about nine o'clock in the morning, and asking directions to president's house. When found he tied his horse to a post, and ringing at the bell, a negro made his appear-

"Is President Adams in?" asked Governor Matthews.

"Yes, sir."

"Glad to see you Governor Mat-thews; take a seat."
"You appointed me territorial governor of Mississippi, and have recalled the appointment, and if you do not give me a satisfactory reason for your conduct in the matter, I will chastise you, sir."

President Adams saw that he meant what he said an l, using a good deal of diplomacy with him, satisfied his mind that there was no insult, slight or reflection intended in recalling the appointment, and wound up by asking if he had a son. "Yes, I have a son, George, a man about my inches, with a liberal education and for whose integrity I will pledge you my head. I would be pleased if you would give him some office."

"I will give your son an office," said

Mr. A. "Thank you, sir. Good morning," and out he walked, mounted his horse, and turned his face toward President Adams kept his word, and appointed George Matthews, Jr., a territorial judge for Mississippi. When Louisiana was purchased of France, Judge Matthews removed to Louisiana, and in time became a supreme court judge, and made something of a reputation as a jurist. - Sarannah News.
