THE PEANUT TRADE.

How Peanuts are Raised and Distributed in the Country.
Within the last two years the raising and handling of the "guber," as the peanut is called in the south, has become an important industry. Yet the producing sections are confined to eastern Virginia and western Tennessee along the Cumberland river. The largest markets for peanuts in the world are Norfolk and Cincinnati. About two months ago the most extensive peanut commission house in Cincinnati moved to St. Louis, and will try to make that city an outlet for the Tennessee stock. Last year the total yield was comparatively light, being about 1,000,000 bushels, while this season the crop is over 3,500,000 bushels. Last year they sold at seven and one-half cents a pound, while this year they can be had at three and a half cents.

The peanut grows very much like a sweet potato, and the vine resembles the red clover. Wherever a new leaf starts out a tendril is formed which extends into the ground. The average yield is from thirty to seventy bushels to the acre, and there are about 100 peanu's on a vine. The article is a good one for speculation, and money can be made by judicious investments, because peanuts do not deteriorate with age and keep their taste for years. The expense of raising them is twice that of corn. The reason of this is that the fruit must be picked by hand, which is slow and laborious. The average annual consumption is over 2,000,000 bushels. Of course the consumption depends upon the price to a great extent. The experiment of cultivating peanuts in California was recently attempted with signal success, and the "Golden State" will probably become a rival of Virginia as a peanut producing locality. A few are raised in North Carolina, Missouri and Arkansas, but the two states referred to grow nine-tenths of all the peanuts used in the world.

A good deal of skill is required in handling gubers. They are shipped in the rough, and the process of cleaning and grading is done by the wholesale purchaser. The peanuts are emptied from sacks into a large bin and are run through a fan which separates the chag. Passing down through another fan, the light nuts are thrown aside and the meaty ones run along a groove, when the black and inferior stock is picked up by girls, and when the nuts reach the packing room there are two grades. During the various processes through which they are sent the nuts become clean and polished. Of course they must be roasted before people will eat them.

Working in the Dark.
"Ma and I," she said shyly, "are more like sisters than mother and daughter."
"Yes!" he said, with a lingering inflection on the afterglow of the yes, which rose clear to the ceiling.
"Yes, indeed," said the girl, her rosy flush on her cheeks making her infinitely more beautiful than ever. "Ma and I are inseparable. We have never been separated a single day since I was a little baby."
"No?" he said, this time with an inflection on the second section of on that went only half way to the ceiling and back again.
"Oh, dear no," the girl went on in her artless way, "and ma and I always said, that when I was married, she was going to love my husband like her own son and come and keep house for us."
"Oh-h?" William said, with a circumflex. Then he rose up slowly and firmly and said that he had a note in bank to take up at three o'clock, and as it was now half-past nine he would go. And he did go. And he didn't come back again. Not never. And ma said to the girl: "That's where you missed it in not fully trusting your mother. Why didn't you tell me that man had been married before? Had I known he was a widower, I would have played the 'Home for old women' racket on him."

A great deal depends on the man who carries the plate. He needs to have a sharp eye, of course not to miss anybody, because there is not one chance in a thousand of his being called back. What he needs more than anything else, though, is business tact. There's everything in knowing how to pass a plate to different people. Some of them are cranky. If you put the plate at them too persistently they feel offended, and take pride in not contributing a cent for six weeks. Then other people have their little weaknesses, and want their light to have a good chance to shine. I knew a man who, if a plate came to him empty, would put on a quarter of a half, and be satisfied with starting it that way; but if there were a lot of quarters and things on already, he'd just as like as not slap down a dollar bill. And he'd get at least a dollar's worth of satisfaction in watching the hesitation of the men next to him, who knew they were as good as he, and yet didn't like to give so much. Why I've had a plate come sailing by me just loaded with bills, and you'd think the congregation was extravagantly liberal, when the fact was that two or three men started in that way, and the rest wouldn't take a bluff.

Lord Stewart.

A. T. Stewart awoke one bright spring morning. After a short prayer he rose and dressed himself with more than his usual dispatch. He then drew up the curtain of his window and looked out at the huge marble palace which had just been finished at the corner of Thirty-fourth street and Fifth avenue.

As he stood looking at the gorgeous dwelling which he intended to make his home the next day, three ideas impressed his mind with increasing intensity. He thought of the marble contractor whom his own close figuring had driven to suicide. Pshaw! it was but the fortune of war. He dismissed the thought with a shrug of his shoulders. The second mental picture was more persistent. It had long been his august custom, on entering his store on a rainy day, to lean against the nearest pillar, and lift his foot in silence. This was the signal for a fierce competition between his partners and employes for the privilege of taking off his lordship's rubbers. The day before it had so happened that a western newcomer had been first on the spot. Instead, however, of deftly removing the dripping rubber, the novice had jerked his master's heel higher with his head and seated him on a more secure but less dignified foundation than a single foot. The deep frown upon Stewart's brow augured ill for the mouth of barbarian should he ever fall into his former employer's power.

But this thought was driven away by a third far more annoying. The best of the girls who ran his heavier sewing machines had been offered $2 a week higher wages by another firm.

"The ingrate!" he muttered. "To try and blackmail me out of two dollars a week. She must go. The house is bleeding at every pore."

But the sight of his marble palace glittering in the morning sunlight drew even this thorn from his memory, and he gave free scope to his joyous anticipations. His keen mind knew the effect of marble and money on men's imaginations, and he already saw his palace the Mecca of the aristocrats of the whole country. In a happy reverie he went down stairs, breakfasted and drove to church.

His day-dream was rudely broken by his clergyman's text. "But God said unto him, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?'"

The great merchant fixed his eyes upon the preacher, who was an orator of no mean ability. The man of God painted the state of the rich man, who cared delicately every day and whose only care at length grew to be the question what to do with his overflowing wealth. "And he said, 'This will I do; I will pull down my barns and build greater. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry.'"

"But God said unto him: 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee.'"

Stewart trembled; he was seized with a superstitious presentiment that the day he went to live in his palace would be his last day on earth. He forgave the sewing machine girl; and in that same hour began to think out those great schemes of philanthropy, that after his death were frustrated by his executors. This was the real reason why Stewart's palace remained so long vacant.

How Carrara Marble is Quarried.
There are 6,000 men at work in the quarries at Carrara, sixty-five quarries and twenty-five polishing wheels, which brighten dull marble and smooth the slight fortunes of some 400 plodding workers. The heaving of rough rocks, huge in their proportions, is something approaching the marvelous here. The men are hoisted to the height of some 700 feet above the level of the quarry, and up aloft excavate perfectly colossal lumps of Carrara marble. Each gang, or the foreman of the gang, goes down with and on the lump, as it is swung by derrick, rope out into earth. One of these Italians will sing in "Justy tones," "Viva, Viva Garibaldi," from his dizzy eminence and suddenly appear below where you are standing, his bright, big black eyes full of unequalled expressiveness and his white teeth glittering between unapproachable smiles—the inalienable gifts of these people—and say, "Ah, signore, will you go up with me again?" just as if it were a perfectly ordinary feat. The free, easy and primitive style of this Carrara flying trapeze work makes it appear doubly dangerous. Hundreds of accidents occur every year. Children scarcely out of their swaddling clothes work amidst the glare and dust of this lovely white marble and die with sore eyes and stifled lungs. The food is dry bread, a raw onion and dirty water. It is the only place in Italy where wine is not drunk. Worn out by incessant severe toil, these people, insufficiently fed, fall into dissipation, violence and crime, dying like dogs and leaving on the white marble the sweat of their wretched lives.
