What he did in the room and what he came there for has not been revealed to the people until a stranger came through the place a few days ago, after nineteen years of companionship with him. He occupied the room and always locked it, carrying the keys with him. After being with the people some time he was asked to participate in their pleasures and assemblies. He gave his name as Sinclair and would entertain them with marvelous tales of travel and adventures, claiming to have been a sea captain. He soon became a great favorite with the people, but his mysterious ways and manners kept them away from him somewhat. He was of a nervous temperament and was always watchsomewhat. for some one. Astoria, Oregon, Sept. 19th, 1985. His grandmother had a cold in her head, and asked him to give her somethead, and asked him to give her some-thing, but he neglected to do so.

"That's a pretty howdy do," said the old lady indignantly. "You have been studying medicine for three years, and you can't prescribe for your old grandmother when she has a cold."

"O, I can prescribe for you just the same as if I had graduated, if that's all you want; but it ain't going to do all you want; but it ain't going to do you any good."

It is estimated that the total expense incurred in the Inaugural celebration amounts to $45,000. Imagine Jefferson, after riding up to the Capitol on horseback, slinging the bridle over a paling and walking in to be inaugurated, viewing in his simplicity a bill of expenses footing up $45,000.

One of the most novel marriages in the history of Norwood took place last week. The applicants were a lady and gent of the ebony hue. The young Justice of the Peace, who is ery conversant with the law, but a little inexperienced in performing marriage ceremonies, proceeded to unite the happy pair. His face bore marks of excitement, and, in a nervous tone, he bade the two join hands. This they did, joining, however, their left hands, and were made one. The joyous couple, then proceeded to depart, whereupon the following conversation conversation.
