Leaving out of consideration the old famous species of longevity and all doubtful modern instances of men and women living to be a hundred years old or more, there remains enough of centenarians the data of whose birth is recorded, and the fact of whose living a century or more is beyond dispute. Indeed, such cases seem to be growing more and more common, and attract no great attention. Yet there are a few spectacles more profoundly interesting than that of a life protracted beyond the ordinary limits of old age. To have survived all or almost all of one's generation, is itself a proof of some sort of superiority of tissue or habit environment. It is to have held out longest in the hopeless fight of all things living against death, and per-haps to have shown that most men lie before their time. Let men affect what pretense of pessimism and disgust with life they will, they cannot help loving life and clinging to it. Religious enthusiasm may regard it as but a passage the sooner crossed the better to a higher form of existence; and inability to perform its duties or incapacity for its enjoyments may lead unfortunate natures to throw it blindly away; but to men of thoroughly sane organlife disgusts or bores are deprived of the faculty of judging it properly. Life is not for them, but for those who know how to use it; and to those who know, and are so fortunate in mind and circumstances as to exeighty or ninety as at twenty-five. Nor need the strength of even fivescore years be labor and sorrow if the faculties be, as sometimes they are, unimpaired.

It is sometimes said that the men who really live wear out early, and that people live to be old by creep-ing sluggishly along, burning life's candle to the socket by niggardly hus-bandry of its light. But aside from the fact that the names of some of the greatest thinkers and scholars of the past are to be found in the lists of octogenarians and nonagenarians, is it not true that it is this intellectual sluggishness, this want of flexibility to meet the changing conditions which the change of years brings; this want of interest in contemporary life, that prevents many men from attaining to a fortunate old age? So long as a man keeps his faculties employed and interested, so long as he is alert to all the movements of the world about him, so long he remains young, and so much the greater are his chances of coming to what is called old age. That torpid and dark old age wherein the physical powers have feebly survived the decay of the intellectual is but death devoid of its peace and dignity; but what time of man's years is more splendid and imposing than the tranquil old age of a life which has widened as it lengthened, the magestic age of Plato, Michael Angelo, and Gothe? The ordinary life of man seems to be deprived and defrauded, com-pared with these lives to which wisdom and length of days were given The full century of existence which Sir Moses Montefoire filled with beneficent activities is not too long to live. Indeed, instead of regard-ing lives so long as something abnormal and extraordinary, ought perhaps to be regarded as coming nearer to the full measure and best rule of existence, while the lives of most men are shortened and cut off before their real maturity. Old age has been and is too much re garded as but the lees of life, unlov able, squalid, and pitiable, as the Greeks were always bewailing it to Men want to live long, but hate old age. The grand secular life which ended at Ramsgate recently, would serve to teach the thoughtless and the foolish how noble and desirable is an old age of activity and wisdom. Men at the longest do not get so much of life that they can afford to neglect even the smallest part of it. And in view of such lives as that of the Hebrew philanthropist, a well-conditioned old age seems only a continuing and riper youth.

The best is yet to be:
The last of life, for which the first was made.
