The Sandal-Wood of Japan.

Passing by a shop you see cords of wood cut into small blocks about six wood cut into small blocks about six inches long. This you learn is nothing short of shoe-timber. These cords of wood will speedily be converted into shoes of various sizes, at prices ranging all the way from four to twenty cents. One feels quite exalted in a pair of twenty cent shoes. The wood is called kiri, and is very light. The clogs are still further lightened by hollowing out the center. So, in point of fact, there is little truth in calling the shoes heavy, although they appear so to the inexthough they appear so to the inex-perienced observer. It must be ad-mitted, though, that they are unreasonably clumsy. Sometimes the shoes worn by the ladies are lacquered, and are fastened by a velvet band passing from either side over the lower part of the instep, and be-tween the first and second toes. With this same kind of wood is made bureaus provided with strong iron handles, and the whole box is adjust-able in horizontal sections, one piled above another. Owing to the light-ness of the wood these boxes may be filled with clothing and carried off on the shoulders of the coolie in case of fires, which so often vex the people of Tokio.—[Correspondence Chicago

None, we think, will deny to Emerson a singular power of sententious speech, and a singular purity and keenness of critical insight. To our mind, Emerson was rather an un certain oracle, some of whose sayings ring forever in the mind, while other only jingle there, than either a poet or a philosopher. There was too much strain in him for either. He rose too much on tiptoe for the poet, and was too broken in his insights for a philosopher's steady continuity of thought. . . Emerson lived in a pale, moonlit world of ideality, in which there was little that was adapted to tame the fierce passions and appease the agonizing remorse of human nature. He was a voice to the pure intellect and the more fastidand startle many generations with its clear, high-thrilling notes.—[London Spectator.

"Can't you tell me, sir, where I might find a situation?" asked a young man of a Chicago citizen. "I am a stranger here."

"What at?" was the reply.
"Oh, anything at all. I am not afraid of work."
