The one redeeming point about the London tavern is the barmaid. I am told on good authority that in metropolitan London alone, with its population of about five million souls of one kind and another, there are the long to the long the lo one kind and another, there are twelve thousand barmaids, exactly double the number of girls employed in one capacity or another about the theaters. A barmaid must be young theaters. A barmaid must be young and attractive. She is required to a dress in a black cashmere or French merino princess robe, so as to be distinguished from the mistress—a London tavern, like an American farm, must have a mistress—who generally appears behind the bar in the gaudiest colors, and above all to prevent rivalry in dress between the barmaids themselves, and therefore to lessen the temptation of dipping their hands in the till. The dress, too, it may be mentioned, must be too, it may be mentioned, must be made without pockets, which I should think must prove a great hardship, especially in this climate, where one is subject to colds in the head. They must, moreover, be in-telligent to the extent of at least engaging the customers of the "masher" type in conversation, and of leading them on to spend a great deal of their time and money at the bars. It is, however, a mark against a barmaid if she devotes herself too exclusively to one or two persons. This is not con-ducive to trade. Her policy is, therefore, to talk a little to every one, and, having to serve all and sundry as they come up to the bar, she is able to pass from one to another with-out giving apparent offense. In this way a barmaid picks up a great deal of surface knowledge, and, in many instances, becomes really smart and accomplished for bayend her statics.

accomplished far beyond her station But she is by no means the slave of her customers. Let any one, espe-cially a stranger, attempt familiari-ties with her, or address language to her, which, according to her lights, she considers as unbecoming a gentleman, she will have that person up before the master or mistress at once, or call into instant requisition the services of the "chuske cut." the services of the "chucker-out." Of course she must necessarily over-hear a great deal that is not fit for ears polite, but so long as it is not addressed to her and the person using it does not make a disturbance, that is none of her business, and though obliged to serve the low types of character above described, it is not expected of her, however, that she shall hold any conversation with them further than the transaction she has with any of their demands. It is a barmaid's ambition to be promoted from the Bill Sykes side of the bar to Complete Treatment with Inhaler $1 that of the masher. Here she is in her element. She can listen to silly nothings by the hour from a dozen of nonentities, her object evidently being to keep as many as possible of what she calls her customers on the tenter-hooks. See her in the evening. if she is at all attractive; she is a per-fect flower pot, because of bouton-aires and bouquets that have been presented her during the day by her numerous admirers. Yet her life cannot be all a bed of roses. She is required to be on her feet fifteen hours a day every day in the week; she must live on the premises, and she is only allowed to go out one day in four or five weeks; she is boarded by her employer, and receives for wages, with which she must clothe herself and always appear respectable, on an average of about £2 a week.—[Lon-
