of Shiloh he rarely-very rarelysmoked; and that it had never been a habit, much less a pleasure. At the battle of Shiloh he chanced to smoke a cigar while riding over the field, and the newspaper correspond-ents, seizing upon the incident, described it graphically in their acthe north. The idea of a victorious commander of a great army, in the midst of frightful scenes of carnage and destruction, surrounded by the dangers of battle, with a nation's life hanging on the result, looking on calmly and serenely, complacently smoking a cigar, when most men would be overcome with excitement, if not nervousness, was something that appealed irresistibly to popular admiration. Grant's admirers and friends, reading the accounts of the battle, supposed him to be a great smoker, and almost deluged him with cigars as presents from his northern friends. As the general said: "There were always two or three boxes on the table in my tent or head-quarters free for the use of my staff and visitors. Having them always at hand, it was but natural that I should every little while take a fresh cigar, and in that way the habit grew upon me so that it be-came irresistible, and the people no doubt are right in calling me an inveterate smoker."-[Cincinnati Com-

"If the original forests of the States of Ohio and Indiana were standing to-day," says a lumber buyer, "their valuation would be many times greater than are the farms which they sacrificed to improve. In making their farms the settlers in those States destroyed millions and millions of dollars' worth of black wal-nut. Miles and miles of fence are laid with black walnut rails. old farmer says that only thirty years ago he began making his farm, and that he had worked eight years in clearing it of the black walnut timber, eighty acres of which he burned up. After thirty years of cultivation the farm is worth $8,000. If it had its walnut timber back it would be worth more than $100,000. This farmer is only one among thousands who for years girdled, cut, and burned the great forests they found occupying the land."
