The Display of Genius in Maine,

Two little Lewiston boys in skirts are laying siege to the heart of a wee damsel who sits on the front seat at the primary school, and is dividing her attention between both of her admirers who are in dead love. A funny thing was that which one of them did one day this week. His papa gave him a nickel for being a good boy. He didn't buy candy, although that was the original plea by which he obtained the nickel. Not at all. He went over post haste to the abode of his little lady and gave her the money on condition that she would hold his and his hand alone on the way to school the next day. The trade was struck, and the next morning the programme was carried out. The fond mother of the little miss saw, as the result of this secret transaction, one tearful little boy in a blue blouse waist and skirt weeping bitter tears over the front yard fence, while down the street, in proud consciousness of having euchred a dreaded rival, marched the other boy hand in hand with the little girl. The father has great hopes for the boy who struck the bargain.
