"I have suffered from Salt Rheum for over eight years, at times so bad that I could not attend to my business for weeks at a time. Three boxes of CUTICUEA and four bottles of RESOLVENT have entirely cuted me of this dreadful disease."

Napoleon the Third.

Napoleon III. lived in a perpetual dream. He was born to dwell in silence and solitude rather than in the din and splendor of the Tuileries. I have seen him at the Elysee, and at St. Cloud seeking out a tree, and not a man. On many days he never awoke at all; he was a somnambu-list, and subject to hallucinations. This is why when people stood in his presence they asked themselves if he was still there. Often he appeared not to hear, because he answered not. But on the morrow he proved to you that he had heard distinctly. He thrust the cup from reality, even when the cup was not tinged with bitterness. He loved everything from afar, even womankind. When he was at the table he to heartily and trank to heartily and ate heartily and drank tolerably, but without knowing whether the cook-ing was good or the wine of genuine stock. When he went to the Bois de Boulogne it always seemed as if he were there for the first time, so few faces did he recognize. He sa-luted with his hand, but not with his mind. Hence it was, those about him often said: "What can he be thinking of?" His political enemies thinking of?" His political enemies wrote that he only thought of betraying France. On the contrary, he only thought of making France great and invincible. He desired that everybody should be rich, and that the fowl in the spot spoken of by Henry IV. should be a chimera no more. For the tyrant had a no more. For the tyrant had a heart of gold.

The dread of reality, while it raised him in the cloud-land of rev-eric, kept him away from the truth. Therefore it was that after the cele brated congress of Paris, he com-mitted none but capital errors. Therefore it was that, having de-cided that the empire was peace, he waged war for the sake of others. He fancied himself still a believer in the strength of the Latin races when he wished to have an emperor crowned in Mexico. He did not perceive, so blind was he, that while he strove to govern the world, the sacrificed France.

The everlasting dreamer, who did not even awake at Sedan, was a sort of ice-bound hell paved with good intentions. He partook of De Saint Pierre's longings for perpetual peace. He gathered inspirations from all the reformers who planned the hap-piness of nations. He retained in his soul the generosity of Queen Hortense, and of Josephine, his mother and grandmother. He never refused ought except to himself. That man who had so many enemies was not his enemies' enemy. Two days after the coup d'etat he thought of the amnesty. He read "Les Chatiments" without faltering in his admiration of Victor Hugo. He desired to enrich Lamartine-another dream. He forgave the acts of treachery of those who surrounded him because he made allowance for a proportion of evil while he wished that good should provail. People spoke of his leaden eye and even of his stupidity, which was at one time legendary, but beneath a mask of impassiveness he concealed the fire that consumed him. He was hardly ever the man of action on guard at the gates of the Louvre as at the gates of France. As has been said, he believed in his star, in the superior government of things, as Bossuet puts it.

That man who loved adventures and feared nothing bore not audacity on his face. At first sight he was not thought capable of filling an important portant part. He was small, he walked badly, he did not shine, nothing about him appeared endowed with life, neither his hair, nor his eyes, nor his mouth. Yet when speech or smile animated him you felt that he was a man. On horseback particularly he broke his bonds and acquired some majesty. At ta-ble, too, he looked well, for he was all bust. When he donned his uniform he had somewhat the air of a conqueror. No one doubted his bravery. In that strange life of his one scarcely detects here and there his will, so much did he waver be tween yes and no. Like a painter impressed with the idea of grandeur and beauty, he aspired to everything. But he stopped short at the sketch, not being gifted as are the masters of the world. Hence his personality, which he wished to be glorious, will remain in half-tint; history will only devote to him pages wherein the shadows will cover the light. -[Houssaye.
