After-Dinner Speaking.

A patient who complained of the danger of exposure to "night air" was told by his physician that night and day air were the same thing. Undoubtedly the chemical constitu-ents are the same, but, for all that, Pacific Fisheries! the average sensibility readily finds a peculiarity in "night air." Oratory consists of words, tones, and gestures, as air consists of oxygen and nitrogen, but there is a marked difference in different kinds. It may not be easy to exactly de-fine them, but the court-room, the hustings, the lecture platform, the pulpit and the dinner table each have their appropriate styles of speaking. And really none of them demands a more peculiar gift than the successful after dinner speech. It need not, or perhaps we should say, it must not, be profound, and it certainly cannot be prosy. It may have one or another of a dozen qualities which may save it from failure, provided it only avoids those which are not suited to its province.

Canon Farrar says that the Amer-ican Press, with charming frankness, asserts that his voice is monotonous, and that he does not know what to do with his hands, and he freely admits that the American Press is right. But these lacks do not prevent the archdeacon from being a capital after-dinner speaker. Indeed, his very confession has in it a dash of that humor which is almost an essential of post-prandial success. In the qualities of self-possession and an easy elecution nobody could be a greater contrast to the English churchman than that other recent English visitor to our shores, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, who proved to be unsurpassed as an after-dinner It is frequently remarked that this is a department of oratory in which Englishmen do not as a rule excel, but certainly the lord chief justice had few superiors among the many brilliant Americans whom he met while in this country.

Nor could anything better illustrate the diversity of successful types of this class of speeches than that of Mayor Palmer at the banquet given by the city of Boston to Lord Coleridge at the Palmer House, and his lordship's reply. Mayor Palmer, who has attained great reputation in this direction, fairly outdid himself on this occasion, and his speech was a perfect gem. But the guest of the ccasion was up to any demand, and his reply was equally a model. The mayor was the more oratorical, and lacked something of the spontaneity which characterized the reply of the chief justice, and which is one of the charms of an after-dinner speech. And this suggests one of the arts which professional after-dinner speakers use (for there are professionals), and that is the seizing of occurrences or utterances of the moment as a sort of warp on which to weave the fabric of the speech. It requires facility in thinking and readiness of expression to do this so deftly that the patchwork shall not show the seams which hold it together, but it is essential to the highest success, and he who can accomplish it fairly well need seldom be at a loss for material for an effort of this kind, unless he unhappily comes first on the list.

The ability to tell a good story well is also a great help to the afterdinner speaker, though he may suc-ceed without it. Good stories are always scarce, and especially such as have not lost their aroma by fre-quent repetition. They are like the parsley which garnishes the salid not essential to its flavor or relish out making it more appet appealing to a sense auxiliary to the

If to the readiness, versatility and story-telling capacity one adds the wealth of illustration which comes from wide reading and a tenacious memory and a gift of quick-witted audacity which some men have, he may confidently hope to get through his post-prandial effort with credit to himself and pleasure to his audience. But pæta nascitur; and this really first-class after-dinner speaker who is not born may be set down as pon Of the born after-dinner speakers Judge Thomas Russell, of Boston or Chauncy M. Depew, of New York, are brilliant examples; while, if the cable has told us the truth, James Russell Lowell has left as shining a reputation for this sort of thing on the other side of the water as the lord chief justice left with us.— [George A. Marden, in Boston Globe.

Cure For Piles.
