Thackeray as an Art Critic.

All Itching and Scaly Skin and Scalp Diseases Cured In June, 1838, the first of his art criticisms appears. Thackeray was then twenty-seven years old. He had seen much of life in various countries; at Weimar, where he en-joyed the society of Goethe; at Rome, with Ingres, the French painter; and at Paris, among all sorts of people. His first intention was to become a painter. It is doubtful if he would ever have succeeded us an artist. He had all the artist's imagination, and some skill in sketching and in caricaturing; but his drawing was deficient in fin-ish and faulty in perspective. He copied some of the most celebrated pictures at Paris and Rome; but af-ter oil it was as the for anisoment ter all, it was rather for enjoyment than as a serious business. At that time his means were ample. When, afterward, it came to working for a livelihood, literature, not art, was his chosen medium for addressing the world. His hand was not equal to the execution of the scenes in which his imagination reveled. Be-yond sketches-of which hundreds are found scattered through the books he read-and the illustration of some of his own novels and stories, none of his art-work is known to exist. Yet there is a freedom and power in some of these which more than make up for their evident defects. Who would miss the striking individuality of his representationssuch, for instance, as Miss Swartz Rehearsing for the Drawing-room, or Mr. Osborne's Welcome to Ameliafor any amount of technical skill and superiority? Perhaps the earlier part of Clive Newcome's career is a fair representa-tion of his own; that half jocose, half earnest playing at art, which never makes an artist. Yet such study as in his youth he gave to painting he afterward turned to better uses in literature. The satirical saying that the critics are those who have failed in their profession does not apply to Thackeray. Never was more kindly, or generous, or appre-ciative critic of painters. If there was any excellence in a picture, he was sure at least to try to find it; and if he could not say anything good, he said nothing. He never learned to wield the bludgeon or the broadsword. His whole spirit is helpful and encouraging to every kind of merit. Nowhere can one find an expression of his concerning a picture which is not good-tempered, honest and frank. His own failure did not sour him, nor awaken any jealousy toward others more success-ful. His sense of justice told him

San the verdict was a correct one. - His first published essay on art matters is under the rhythmical title,

"Strictures on Pictures." It is in the form of a letter from Mr. Michael Angelo Titmarsh, and bears date, with all that particularity which distinguishes the correspondence of Englishmen, "Lords Hotel, New Street, Covent Garden, Tuesday, 15th May, 1838." It is addressed with equal minuteness of detail to "Monsieur Anatole Isidor Hyacinthe Achille Hereuse de Bricabrac, Peintre d'Histoire, Rue Mouffetard, It gives an elaborate aca Paris." count of the paintings exhibited in London, in the spring of 1838, in the three picture galleries of that city. It is full of the warm enthusiasm with which he always rejoiced to recognize merit in his contemporaries, ognize merit in his contemporaries, and the bright humor and satire with which he always equally re-joiced to attack pretension. His an-ger is roused by the place of exhibi-tion. The Royal academy exhibition is held "in one wing of a little building like a ginshop." He is so impressed with this that he repeats the same comment the part year Close connections made at Ashland with stages of the California, Oregon & Idaho Stage Co.
