A Million for a Horse. In the old days when the lately bankrupted Henry N. Smith was one of the bosom friends of William H. of the bosom friends of William p. Vanderbilt, an incident occurred which goes far to show plainly one or two of the personal characteristics of the railroad magnate. People who bear in mind how Mr. Smith was credited a couple of years ago with having fleeced one of Mr. Vanderbilt's sons out of some millions in a stock speculation, and who re call also the theory that was current not long ago, that Smith owed his late financial disaster to vengeance wreaked upon him by that young man's father-people who remember those things, remember too, that the time was when Henry N. Smith and William H. Vanderbilt were almost inseparable companions. What one enjoyed the other shared; where one went the other attended. On nearly every pleasant afternoon they were to be found at Fleetwood Park enjoying the cream of life be-hind horseflesh that would have driven all Arabdom mad with jealousy. One day Mr. Smith appeared with a new horse-spirited, handsome, and fast beyond anything on the track. Mr. Vanderbilt's eye was taken at once. His heart went out in one big dash of affection for that animal. He must have it. Whatever the cost he would pay it for such a treasure, and he made a point-black demand on his friend at once for a transfer of ownership, Smith wouldn't listen to such talk. He had bought a horse for his own use; it wasn't for sale. The animal was after his own heart; no money would tempt him to part with such a

"I will give you $10,000 for him just as he stands," said Mr. Vanderbilt.

"Oh, no, you won't," retorted Mr.
Smith. "Twice that sum wouldn't buy that horse. I don't want to sell, and don't intend to sell."

"I'll give you $50,000."
"Look here, William," quoth Mr. Smith, "I tell you this animal's not for sale. That settles it. I like him. I can afford to keep him, and I'm going to do just that same thing. William, be a gentleman and shut up."

That ended the talk. Henry N drove one way, William H. drove another. They didn't address one another during that afternoon. It was very evident from his manner that Mr. Vanderbilt had been deeply offended. So much in love had he fallen suddenly with the coveted steed that it seemed to him only the extremest meanness that would deprive him of the prize. He was amazed the next morning when he went down to his stable. A strange horse stood in one of his stalls. It was the very animal that Henry N. Smith had refused a small fortune for less than twenty-four hours be-fore. He summoned his stableman, and was told that Mr. Smith him-self had brought the horse over to the stable, and left, saying merely: "Tell Mr. Vanderbilt that the horse is his, and that he is welcome to it." The millionaire's delight was almost boundless. Such good fortune he had not even dared to dream about. If he had been little Billy Vanderbilt in his first pair of red-topped, brass-toed, high boots he could not have been one whit happier. That evening he met his "Ah, Henry, I see you finally came to my terms," he ejaculated. "Well, $50,000 is a pretty big price for a horse, but you're welcome to it, old fellow, you're welcome to it."

"Your $50,000 be blowed!" re-torted Mr. Henry N. Smith. "I don't want your money. When I told you I wouldn't sell that horse I meant it. But if your heart is set on him, I'm not going to let such a thing come in between our friendship, so I give him to you."

"William H. Vanderbilt stood as one stupefied"—says the Wall Street man who tells me the story and vouches for its truth-and then there was, he says, such a supper as only a Delmonico carte blanche can provide. And before that evening was over, William H. Vanderbilt had taken Henry Smith into a Lake Shore stock deal, from which profits fell into Henry N. Smith's pockets to the tune of over a million of dollars .- New York Times.
