THE GAMBLER'S STORY.
I met him by accident in a railway station. The train was late and he and I were the only occupants of the dingy little waiting room. Under these circumstances folks are drawn toward each other by the magnetism of mutual discomfort, and we fell to talking. He was a fine looking fellow, tall, well built, and vigorous, but an air of indescribable melancholy permeated his appearance and tinged even his talk to such an extent that our conversation languished and would probably have died entirely had he not finally turned around and said to me:
"You must excuse me, sir, for an apparent moodiness. The truth is that I am unable to shake off the recollection that to-night is the anniversary of a sad and singular event in my life. I was a professional gambler in my younger days and dealt faro for a living, but ten years ago to-night I quit forever under circumstances that even now half unman me and call tears to my eyes. I have no objection to telling you the story if you think that it would interest you."
I begged him to go on and he proceeded as follows:
"Ten years ago," he said, "I was the proprietor of club rooms at Baltimore, where I dealt a game of faro for a circle of players. They were all heavy betters, business men most of them, and I catered to their game only. My rooms were sumptuously fitted up. There was no appointment that guided vice could suggest that was not at hand, and my sideboard groaned with the choicest vintages that money could buy.
"One night when the game was slack and I was lounging in the dealer's chair under the crimson globe of the chandelier, a stranger entered the room. He was very young, but dissipation or care had drawn lines upon his boyish face, and his dark eyes burned with a feverish light. As he approached the table I marked how ghastly pale he was and that his hand trembled as though with a chill. He took a seat and drawing a thousand dollar bill from his pocket, tossed it across the table, 'Give me that much in chips,' he said in a tremulous voice.
"I think he must have played for an hour. Luck went back and forth for awhile, but finally it set in against him and I raked in the last of his ivories. For a moment he sat motionless, staring, dazed like a cat on the floor, then he lifted up his haggard face to mine. 'Sir,' he said, 'you have, without knowing it, done me a favor. Had I won I would have kept on in the old way; now that I have lost, I will never gamble again.' I smiled cynically. 'Yes,' I said, 'I have heard people talk that way before.' 'You mistake me,' he went on in a voice that thrilled my very heart. 'I will not gamble again because the last card you turned was my death warrant. Listen to me. That thousand dollars I have lost was the last of fortune, home, and honor. It is gone, all gone to enrich your clan. I am not blaming you; I am not complaining; I am simply stating a fact. I am tonight the worst of paupers—one without a trade, without a profession, without the ability to support the wife who is this moment confidently and trustingly awaiting my return. She knows nothing of my gradual downfall. I have dissipated, God knows how, before her. I have not now one dollar upon the face of the earth, and I determined when I entered your door that if it came to this, if my last stake lost, I would this night terminate the failures and follies of my life. I am in earnest. Something impelled me to tell you this, and these will probably be my last words,' he said with a look of pain."
"I arose, deeply moved, and pulling open the drawer took out the thousand dollar bill. 'Here, my friend,' I said, 'take back this money and begin life over again. It will keep you until you can get employment. Go home and confess everything to your wife, be a man and keep out of gambling halls forever.'"
"He started violently, turned crimson, and for an instant choked up in a throat. 'Generous man,' he said finally, 'I cannot and will not accept this money. It is yours.

You won it fairly, but if you will give me half of it, I will follow your advice. You may not realize it, sir, but you have to-night snatched a soul from the brink of eternity."
"I counted him out $500, and with tears streaming from his eyes he left the house."
"And from that time you quit gambling?" I exclaimed, strangely impressed with the narrative.
"No, not exactly from that time," replied the stranger, choking a sob, "it was about an hour later, when I found out that thousand dollar bill was counterfeit and I had been worked for the $500."
I walked out into the still, solemn night, and waited for the train alone.

Returning Chinese.
About 300 Chinamen arrived here last evening from Tacoma. They are the men who had trouble with their foremen near the Cascades tunnel a few days since, in which several were shot by hired "detectives." They were offered $1 a day by the N. P. R. R. Co., to stay on the work, but refused. Chinamen are in demand at present. Sisson & Crocker, contractors on the C. & O. railroad, have several agents here endeavoring to secure Chinese laborers. They offer $1 a day, and to give each man an advance of $10, and will pay $2 commission on each man secured. They will endeavor to engage all those who arrived here last night, but the Northern will make an effort to induce the men to go back to work on their line.
—Oregonian, 16.

A Life Made Miserable
By dyspepsia is scarcely worth the living. A capricious appetite, heartburn, puzzling nervous symptoms, increase of action of the heart after eating, sinking in the abdomen between meals, and flatulence after, are among the successive indices of this harassing complaint. Two things only are needed for its removal. A resort to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and persistence in its use. These remedial measures being adopted, a cure is certain. Taken immediately before or after meals, this great stomachic promotes secretion of the gastric juice, the natural solvent of the food. The nervous and bilious symptoms consequent upon chronic indigestion disappear, the complaint gradually yields to the corrective and invigorating influence of the Bitters. Appetite returns, sleep becomes more refreshing, and as a sequence, the body is enriched by nourishment, muscular power increases, and the mind grows sanguine. Use the Bitters for chills and fever, and rheumatism.

The Result in Michigan.
