HASKELL AND THE KNIGHTS.
The Order Denounces Him as an Enemy to Labor.
Burnett G. Haskell, the founder and receptive and retentive treasurer of the Red International on this coast, who went to Denver to edit Buchanan's Labor Enquirer after he had worked the labor movement in this city for about all it could be worth to him, is in hot water there. The Buchanan of the Labor Enquirer is the man who secured the favor of the Knights of Labor and was intrusted with the organization of the railroad employes throughout the southwest. His work was effective in its way and was followed by the great and disastrous railroad strike of last year. He visited this city and in an address at Platt's Hall said, among other things: "I am willing to pledge myself, if the government does not in five years give me my rights, to take them or die in the trenches fighting for them."
After Buchanan was gone Haskell used to harangue crowds of workmen in a similar strain, and predicted a revolution in 1889, but finally went to Denver to edit Buchanan's paper.
Master Workman Powderly and the conservative members who have controlled the Knights of Labor, have incurred the enmity of the anarchists and firebrands in the order by denouncing anarchist teachings, and Haskell in Buchanan's paper has attacked Powderly, but the Denver-Knights of Labor favor law and order, and support Powderly. On the 18th of this month local assembly 3,218, composed of employes of the Union Pacific railroad, passed a series of resolutions denouncing and repudiating Haskell and the Labor Enquirer, and setting forth the following, among other sentiments:
"The Labor Enquirer * * * has for a long time been teeming with libelous insinuations and charges against the general officers, especially our general master workman, and the evident intent has been to prostitute our order and drive out the true members and make the order the home of anarchy and anarchist teachings. * * * Its editor has proven himself to be a disreputable falsifier, unworthy to be called a Knight of Labor. * * * We feel it our duty to ourselves and our cause to call a halt to this and to place our order in its true light before the world. * * * We repudiate the Labor Enquirer as in no way the organ or mouthpiece of the Knights of Labor. * * * We request the local assembly of which the editor of the Labor Enquirer is a member to expel him from the Order of the Knights of Labor."
Similar resolutions were passed by local assembly 3,714, and the executive board of District Assembly 82 indorsed them.
The efforts of Haskell and his socialist and anarchistic followers to get control of the Knights of Labor on this coast were a dismal failure. The sentiment in favor of Powderly and law and order is overwhelming. Haskell boasted a year ago that the International had absolute control of the federation of trades, but a storm was stirred up among the bona fide working people of the coast which nearly destroyed the federation and resulted in driving out those of the Internationalists who did not smother their sentiments and profess a love of law.—S. F. Chronicle, 23.

"The Gem of the Mountains."
The above beautiful translation of the Indian name "Idaho," has been so long accepted by the inhabitants of that province, as the true and fitly spoken one, that we have serious doubts of their ever discarding it for the one now offered by the "poet of the Sierras." Following we give his definition, together with his failure as a town builder:
"Idaho.—This Indian name, like all others, has its accent on the second syllable. It is pronounced I-dah-ho! Literally it means 'where the light is.' A larger and more complete translation would be, 'where the light first rests on the mountain at sunrise.' If you care to look on the map, you will find the name of my town there. But it is on the map only; for soon after I had established my express office and the boys had pitched their tents and cabins around me—this was when the Idaho mines were first discovered—there came a man, one Dr. Ferbut, along, who had a daughter. Her name was Florence. And as he could not get a lot for his drug store to suit, he went a half a mile further on with his daughter and there sat down. My town disappeared from history in less than half a year. The miners gathered around the old man and his daughter. They named their town Florence, and it became the capital of Idaho."
