Last Saturday evening, at the regular meeting of the biological society, held at the United States museum, Capt. J. W. Collins, the scientific skipper of the United States fishery commission, exhibit ed a collection of curios which had been taken from the stomachs of codfish at sundry times while being split and dressed by the bank fishermen off Newfoundland, the process usually taking place on deck. Among the lot were a splitting knife with a wooden handle and blade about six inches long, a small brass-handled knife of quaint workmanship, a rough piece of red granite weighing three or four pounds, an old felt hat, two counters and part of a euchre deck (five cards), a fragment several inches long, which the scientists thought was lignite, and a brass lamp!-Ex.

When a grown person and a baby meet the former laughs and the latter stares. It may not be polite for a grown person to laugh at one who does not know what a poor investment he has made in joining the human menagerie, but the baby can certainly be excused for failing to disguise his consternation upon seeing the awful possibilities of his grown up condition. To think that he shall develop into such a thing as that which he sees before him is quite enough to make him stare, and, as he oftentimes does, to pucker up his lip and crv.
