Women as Ranch Owners.

It is interesting to know that among the occupations which are open to women the hard life of ranching has been one in which she has been particularly successful.

The very hardships are said to have a fascination for one who has a bit of love of adventure in her nature, and some women bred here in the east have this generally supposed to be masculine trait strongly developed. A good horse-woman with courage and endurance can find a vast field for her out-of-door inclinations in managing a cattle ranch, or even a sheep ranch for that matter. If a ranch-woman is successful it is for the same reason that the ranchman is successful—because of energy, the possession of capital, and hard work against countless discouragements and sacrifices. There is no royal road to fortune, either east or west. I have in mind as an instance of a successful cattle-raiser a lady who had been brought up amid all the enervating influences of a city-bred girl's life and who had spent much of her freshness in the gayeties of the representative social center of the country. When she became the wife of an army officer she learned the valuable lesson of adapting herself to circumstances. In this way she received an education which was to fit her to become one of the most successful ranch owners of the southwest, when, on the death of her husband, she found herself alone in the world, with a modest capital. There is no suggestion in the wholesome, robust, successful ranchwoman of that delicate hothouse flower which was the picture of her first youth.—Boston Post.
