Do All The Cows Pay a Profit?
 It may be said of dairymen as of those who are engaged in other branches of farming—too many of them fail to study the details of their business, and as a consequence, how much their profits are reduced by losses that could be prevented if they only understood just where these occurred. In almost every dairy herd a correctly kept record would show that some cows failed to return any profit, and some made a loss by the end of the year. There may be enough such cows in the herd to absorb all or nearly all of the profit from the best cows. In only one way can this be determined, and that is by keeping an account of the yield of each cow. It is not sufficient to find that the herd, taken as a whole, has paid a profit; for this could be increased by weeding out the cows that proved unprofitable. Doing this may change the showing for the whole herd, from one of loss to profit.
 A herd of twenty cows that has paid no profit may, on examining the individual record of the cows, show that eight or ten of them pay a fair profit, and that the loss occurs on the rest of the herd. If these profitable cows alone had been kept the dairyman would have been encouraged; his discouragement arises solely from his way of conducting his business. Every dairyman should study his business thoroughly, understand fully its basis, and see that every part of it is attended to.
 One of the first things for him to understand is the lowest production from a cow that will yield a profit. When he has determined this he is prepared to judge correctly of the value of his individual cows. It is certainly easy for him to determine how many pounds of milk a cow must give in a season, if cheese-making, to render her profitable. If he takes a medium price for cheese, say 10 cents, he can easily see that nothing less than 4,000 pounds of milk, or 300 pounds of cheese can pay a profit. It is not possible to keep a cow in any of the dairy states for less than $25, and if all the labor be estimated at $10, the margin of profit on the above yield will be but $5. It will here be plain that he cannot tell whether a cow is profitable for cheese-making unless he knows how many pounds she gives in a season. This, then, is the starting point. In the same way he must know how many pounds of butter a cow will produce, if butter is the product, before he can have any basis for determining the profit of the cow. All these things must enter into his inventory at the end of the year; and from this inventory he must determine, in the case of each cow, whether she is worthy of being retained in his herd. In the case of a butter cow, it is not sufficient for him to know the weight of her milk, but he must know the production of that milk is butter. When brought to this test he will often find a cow that gives 4,000 pounds of milk makes more butter than another which gives 5,000 pounds. The value of the butter cow depends wholly upon her quantity and quality of butter. Why should a dairyman keep a cow year after year that does not pay for her keeping? He certainly would show poor business judgement if he did this knowingly, but there is the difficulty; he goes on year after year losing money on certain cows, simply because he will not take the trouble to find out just what they are doing.
 As many of the cows come in fresh at this season of the year, it is a favorable time for dairymen to begin keeping a record of the yield of each cow, with a view to knowing what she has done, when her milking period ends.
