From Truckman To Millionaire.

Thirty-years ago a freckle faced, stout English lad, broganed and roughly dressed, applied for work in a wholesale shipping and chandler house on South street. He was given a place pushing a hand truck, and he did his work satisfactorily. He found a better situation presently and drifted away The other day a rosy cheeked man stepped along among the trucks and the crowd of South street to find the place where he once worked as a roustabout and labor er. He could have well afforded to have sought the old store in a carriage, but he did not, though he three times over, and lives when at home, in one of the grandest houses in Cleveland, Ohio. His name is Samuel Andrews. When he left New York he went west and made some money in the then comparatively unknown trade of tar roofing. He saved what he had made, and when the Standard Oil company was formed he got in on the ground floor. The way to millions was then opened to him.
