The people of Harney valley are raising means to bore an artesian well. The unusually dry season has produced lamentable results all over eastern Oregon, and water has become invaluable. How to produce it is a question of paramount importance to the settlers, and they are proceeding to do for themselves all that is possible. If there is any virtue in favorable location the people of Harney have everything to hope from well-boring. The great water reser-voirs to be found to the west in the Cascades should furnish deep stores of water ready to rise to the surface. The Blue mountains are yet neares and if being surrounded by vast mountain walls that possess untold stores of water, is a promise of water from artesian sources, then the in-land empire should possess means to create a paradise for its popula-
