"IDAHO."
Something About the Origin of That Name.
From time to time something appears in the public prints connecting the name of the word "Idaho" with the origin of the word "Idaho" in which it is always claimed that the word in question resulted from an interview which Miller had with Colonel Craig while both were traveling through the Nez Perce country in the summer of 1861. Miller is said to give Colonel Craig credit for composing the word from elements found in the Nez Perce language, and which Craig is said to have pronounced E-d-a-h-o, applying the word to the appearance of a neighboring mountain, upon whose summit something was seen to glisten like a diamond or gem. This was no doubt the origin of the Miller-Craig gem of the mountains, but not of the word "Idaho." In the spring of 1860 several months before the discovery of gold had attracted the "Poet of the Sierras" into the Nez Perce country, a steamer was built at the upper Cascades on the Columbia under the auspices of the Oregon Steam Navigation company, and when the steamer appeared in its appropriate place as the name of the vessel. The definition of the word then given to the world was "Gem of the Mountains," and the word was then said to have been taken from the language of one of the Indian tribes inhabiting that portion of the Columbia river valley. Some efforts have been made to find out who it was that first suggested that name for the steamer, but thus far without success. This steamer Idaho plied upon the waters of the Columbia during the spring, summer and autumn of 1860, and its name was quite familiar to all who traveled through the country that year. When it became necessary to find a name for the new territory which was organized in March, 1863, somebody, probably Salveus Garfield, suggested the name of the old steamer that had been long since used up and relegated to the "bone-yard."
