THE SOLDIER'S GRAVE.

It was long, long since that the soldier died,
'Way back in the early days,
When with red, red coats as proud as goats

The land was all in a blaze. But they dug him a grave, and they dug it deep,

And they dug it long and wide;
And they put thereon a good gravestone
To tell the date he died.

They passed away with the sound of drums, And flags that did flaunt and wave Into other hands went all those lands, And with them the soldier's grave.

And a squatter he was who got those lands,
And little he got them for;
And the sheep did chew the grass that

. Over the wolf of war. But the squatter he fenced the grave around,

All to show the dead respect,
Though like Sir John Moore, who had died before,
But little the soldier recked.

It was right, right early the squatter rose— He's dead now, the Lord him save!— And his stride was grand on his own good land Till he stopped at the soldier's grave.

Patronize Home Industry! He stopped and he stared, and rubbed his eyes, And said but the one word "H——!" For the gravestone there had a circle fair. Marked out by a cold chisel.

Then he set a watch, and a good, good watch,
Who slept with one eye alone,
Till be found the man who made the plan Of the circle on the stone. "Now, God you save, my good, good map," He said to the wight so free— But what the h-l do you do here, tell-Confound you, tell to me.' What am I doin', you want to know?"

The wight replied with leer—
Well, I'm making, I own, a good From this old gravestone here."

A bootless attempt—To get up stairs without being heard by your wife.
