A TERRIBLE ORDEAL.

How President Harrison Found His Father's Corpse.

A well known resident of southern Ohio, speaking a few days ago of the past life of President Harrison, realized probably the most tragic event in the history of the Harrison family, an event which fired the country with indignation and dishonored the name of the Queen City, a deed so foul and revolting that the mind shrinks from its contemplation—the desecration of the tomb of John Scott Harrison, the son of the president of the United States and the father of the man who now occupies the White House. There is something horrible and repulsive in the robbing of a grave the violation by human ghouls where the gentlest of hands are too rude to touch the dead face, the desecration of the sacred spot to which cling the memories of a lifetime, the ruthless exposure of grief that shuns the public gaze after the last formalities are gone through with, and the flowers and tears have been shed upon the narrow home. But horrible as is the riding of the grave of the dead, how much more horrible, more tragic is the thought of the dead man's son climbing to the top story of a medical college in search of the stolen body of a young friend and removing the cloth from the face of a corpse in one of the dissecting rooms, to discover beneath that horrid mask the features of his dead father? Does history afford a more dramatic scene? Marie Antoinette's hair turned white as she viewed her husband's head upon the block of the guillotine. "Could the shock and agony which she experienced have been greater than that of one who had the day before looked, with grief-burdened heart, upon the form of a venerable and long-loved father, had seen it lowered into the grave, the features marked with a graceful smile, beautiful even in death, the next day to see it appear in that most dreadful of places, the dissecting room, robbed even of its shroud, the peaceful smile displaced by distorted features, the venerable snow-white beard rudely cut away to disfigure the body, the head pressed forward, bleeding from the cruel rope by which it had been suspended in the shaft of the medical college?

Yet this is what the grandson of President William Henry Harrison endured.

The death of president Harrison's father occurred suddenly at North Bend, O., a small town fifteen miles west of Cincinnati, in the latter part of May, 1878. The residents of Cincinnati and the vicinity, in fact of all Ohio, were just at that time wrought up over repeated accounts of grave robbing. The very day before the burial of president Harrison's father the grave of the son of a widow named Devin had been rifled in the burial lot adjoining that of the Harrison family in the North Bend cemetery. On account of these robberies extraordinary precautions were taken. A secure receptacle of solid masonry was built in which the iron casket was placed. Three immense stone slabs were lowered with great difficulty and cemented before the earth was thrown in. As an additional precaution General Harrison (now president) paid a watchman $30 to keep guard over the grave for thirty nights.

All precautions were futile. That night two grave robbers drove to the cemetery in a wagon, the fellows of which were wrapped to prevent noise, rifled the grave and took the body to the Ohio medical college at Cincinnati, where it was sold for $10. On the following day John Scott Harrison, Jr., and Carter Harrison, brothers of president Harrison, together with a nephew of General Harrison and a detective, went to the medical college to search for the body of young Devin, who was a distant relative of the family. The building was searched in vain. Every suspicious box and barrel was examined, the chute into which bodies were dropped by the resurrectionists was inspected, also the furnace in which the putrefying flesh was cremated. As a last resort the investigating party entered a small room on the top floor in which they found all sorts of rubbish incident to the dissecting room, but no body. In the further corner of the room was a windlass and rope which ran down through a square hole in the floor, connecting with a shaft that descended five stories to the vat where the bodies were kept. As the party were about leaving the room the defective laid his hand on the rope. It was taut.

"Here is something," he exclaimed, seizing the crank belonging to the windlass. Nearest and nearest it came to the surface. It was a naked body, except the head and shoulders. The cupidity of the ghouls who had rifled the grave had not been satisfied with the price they got for their prey. They had even robbed the corpse of its grave clothes. The only covering was an old tattered shirt used for the purpose of avoiding detection should the body be seen. Slowly it was brought to the level of the floor and raised as far as the windlass would permit.

"It is not the man," said Mr. Harrison. "Devin died of consumption and was more emaciated than this one."

He turned to give up the search, when he was urged by the detective to look at the face, which was still covered.

"It is hardly necessary," said Mr. Harrison, hesitating and evidently desiring to retreat: "still, if you insist—"

The body was thereupon raised out of the well, the trap door dropped beneath it and the body lowered upon it. The rope had been rudely tied about the body below one arm, and as it drew upward had pressed the head forward. When the pressure was released the blood streamed from an incision in the neck. Loosening the rope the body fell to the floor. The light from a window above shone directly upon the head and shoulders. Silently the little group awaited until some one should remove the cloth from the face of the dead. The more restive were preparing to depart when Mr. Harrison, with a cane which he had in his hand, brushed the covering from the face of the body. It revealed the face of an old man, with full white beard cut squarely off below the chin, white hair cut closely at the back, sightless orbs staring upward, a face discolored by the pressure of the rope and the rude handling of those by whom the corpse had been dragged from the grave.

"An old man," remarked some one, and Mr. Harrison stooped to take a closer look at the face. Suddenly his countenance changed color, the blood rushed back to his heart. He reeled and grasped for support.

"What is the matter?" asked some one.

Mr. Harrison said nothing. He was dazed, his blanched face turned to ashy paleness and his eyes, staring from their sockets, were riveted upon the dead face before him. At last he gasped out: "It is father!" and sank unconscious into the arms of the detective.

An undertaker was sent for and the body was taken away and silently re-buried the next day. In the meantime the fact that the body had been stolen had been discovered at North Bend. The messengers sent to the city were met with the circumstances of the discovery of the body by his own son. The excitement at Cincinnati and throughout the country was intense over the outrage. General Harrison himself personally took charge of the case and subsequently had the satisfaction of sending the perpetrators to the Ohio penitentiary.

To old persons and those who fear to derange their stomachs Simmons' Liver Regulator presents itself as a most admirable remedy. Owing to its mild action it can be taken by the weak and debilitated at all times and under any circumstances with perfect safety. One of the most venerable of the U. S. Senate, the late A. H. Stephens, of Ga., said "Simmons' Liver Regulator is mild and suits me better than any other active remedies."

A good many people know the value of a dollar who do not realize the value of a hundred cents.

Ignorance of the law excuses no one—especially from serving on a jury.

Unjust Taxation.

It is unjust to tax the stomach with burthenes that it cannot bear. Many silly people buy tyrannic that fatal serfdom until it rebels and punishes them as they deserve. Dyspepsia is usually the child of gastronomic folly, but whether this or the natural associate of inherent feebleness from childhood, it is surely and pleasantly remediable with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the finest and most highly sanctioned gastric tonic in existence. As a result of the tone imparted to the stomach, and the increased activity of its digestive and assimilative action, insured by the persistent use of this benign, invigorant, general stimulant is augmented, the nerves strengthened and tranquilized, and a tendency to biliousness, chills and fever, rheumatism and kidney troubles are conquered by this admirable medicine.

A hero is a man who refrains from eating things that do not agree with him.

When your blood is impoverished the remedy is at hand. Take Ayer's Sarsaparilla.
