Queer Facts Recaled by the Pressic Records in the Linn County Court House

There has been going the rounds of the coast papers, a romantic story of how a young man, engaged in the marble monument business, had visited the residence of a wealthy widow lady somewhere in the Willamette valley, with the ostensible purpose of obtaining a few week's board and recreation, but with the real motive of procuring an order for a monument for the departed husband of the lady. The story goes on to relate that the young man made himself so useful and pleasing that he won the graces of the lady to the extent that she finally announced her intention of making him her heir, thus nominally placing in his hands property valued at nearly $20,000. At first the young man objected, but finally acquiesced, and remained upon the farm, taking the best care of everything, and treating the old lady with the greatest respect, care and attention, even with

The query has been, where are the real actors in this romantic episode located, and is there really any truth in the story? In answer to this query, says the Albany Herald, it may be said that the location is in Linn county, on the Willamette river a mile below Harrisburg, and the fact as far as the lady endowing the young man with her wealth is concerned is true. A few years ago, an aged and highly respec-ted German citizen, Charles Roth, died leaving the bulk of his property to his esteemed and true wife, Martha Roth. Left alone at the old homestead, where for years the generous hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Roth has been well known and remembered, specially by the steamboat men, who used to ply upon the river much more than at present, and frequently made the Roth landing a stopping place. Mrs. Roth found her lot very lonely indeed. What wonder then, that when a young man usked for hospitality at her house, which she had always been accustomed to lavishly bestow, and reated her with such tender regard, she should wish to retain his attention, and having neither nor hin of her own on who could bestow her property, that she should give it to him in consideration of his care during her lifetime The proof of this somewhat remark-It the young man has the staming of cherish and care for her as long a lives, which, up to date, he seems to have been doing. If he has any compunctions of conscience arising from the fact that he fell heir to a fortune through trying to cuitivate the generous old lady's acquaintance a tombstone for her departed husbane he should make amends for it by tak ing good care of the farm and his ben Bucklen's Armea Saire. THE BEST SALVE in the world is uts, Bruises, Sores, Ulcers, Salt Rheur Chapped Hands
