Anarchy in Boston Schools.

The report of the sub-committee of the Boston school board, by which corporal punishment in the common schools is sustained against the protest of the superintendent of public schools, is a remarkable document. One is first impressed by the extraordinary—we may say the appalling—state of affairs which is represented as existing in the public schools of Boston. Here is one example of this. A committee speaking through its chairman, says:

"Let me give an illustration of one school district, and it is not one of the worst ones by any means, for I can take you to at least three other sections that, in the judgment of the police, are worse. In this school, within a short time, a dozen boys have been arrested for stealing; one boy struck his teacher a heavy blow and nearly killed her; another drew a loaded bludgeon, two feet long, and tried to strike three teachers, calling on the other boys to help him, and threatened to 'swipe out all the teachers.' Three boys within a month have tried to kick the lady teacher. Recently, a boy in a primary school drew a revolver upon his teacher. At the present time eight boys in one primary school belonging to a 'Band of Forty Thieves,' who meet regularly, read dime novels and plan stealing expeditions. Of course this is an extreme case, and can apply to only a very few districts, although many of our schools a few boys of this sort are sure to enter."
