Fir Stronger Than Oak

Some very interesting tests of woods native to Washington and Ore-gon, and others native to other timber sections of the country, were made recently at the Northern Pacific car shops at Tacoma. The purpose was to demonstrate the relative strength of the woods.

Master Mechanics warner and Pripps, of the shops, Engineers Lund and Haines and architect C. B. Talbot.

The timber was subjected to an actual breaking, on sticks 2x4 inches and four feet long, to centers, being one-fourth as long, thick, and wide as an actual stringer as used by the rail-road company in its trestle bridges. The test is important as there seems that subject, and the impression has been that ordinary oak was stronger than fir. The tests show, however, was as follows:

No. 1. Old piece of yellow fir from yard, having decayed ends, six years in the weather, 3063 pounds.
No. 2. New soft piece fine-grain yellow fir similar to the best flooring

No. 4. New piece from butt of tree, broke with a stringy fracture at 3,635
