throw of the ship's side. Then a curious thing occurred. That long line wheeled correctly as a regiment of grenadiers to the eastward. Our ship as it lay there divided the line as it swept round, but did not break its symmetry, and the sea-pigs, driving their shafts of victims before them, were soon away under our stern, still wheeling until they disappeared to the southward. But the vast cloud of birds still thickened the sky. Thousands settled down on the spar and rigging and on the sea also, until to fire a musket among those floating bodies meant death to a score. For half an hour the sun was hidden, and we were bathed in semi-darkness. Then a break occurred in the procession, and soon a little black speck was seen to the southward. It was the bird disappearing. But not all went. Millions had settled down on the sea, and until so far as the eye could reach the water was covered with them. They remained there all night, and so great was the noise of their croaking and shrieking that no sleep visited the weary sailors in their watery bed. For two days we lay thus becalmed, the birds drifting lazily about with us on the sea, gorged with fish, quantities of which floated in the water, and a third evening a flash of lightning from the southwest caused the old man to shorten sail, and before midnight we were lying in a raging pampers. When next morning broke we were the weary sailor in their watery bed. The birds had vanished. One young cape devil alone remained circling about the ship, solemn and somber, like the genius of the storm or the forerunner of fatality.

A Relic of Engineering of Many Centuries Ago.
How many of the engineering works of the nineteenth century, says a recent writer, will there be in existence in the year 6000? Very few, we fear, and still less those that will continue in the far off age to serve a useful purpose. Yet there is at least one great undertaking conceived and executed by an engineer which during the space of four thousand years has never ceased its office, on which the life of a fertile province absolutely depends to-day. We refer to the Barr Jusouf—the canal of Joseph—built, according to tradition, by the son of Jacob, and which constitutes not the least of the many blessings he conferred on Egypt during the years of his prosperous rule.
This canal took its rise from the Nile at Assut, and ran almost parallel with it for nearly 250 miles, creeping along under the western cliffs of the Nile valley, with many a bend and winding, and at length it gained an eminence, as compared with the river bed, which enabled it to turn westward through a narrow pass and enter a district which was otherwise shut off from the fertilizing floods on which all vegetation in Egypt depends. The northern end stood seven feet above low Nile, while at the southern end it was at an equal elevation with the river. Through this cut ran a perennial stream, which watered a province named the Fayoum, endowing it with fertility and supporting a large population. In the time of the ancient world a great part of the canal was under water, and then the river's current would rush in a more direct course into the pass, carrying with it the rich silt which takes the place of manure and keeps the soil in a state of constant productivity.

OUR LITTLE GRIEFS.
Though light as Air We Make Them Into Mountains.
The train stopped suddenly between two stations. Several of the passengers rushed out of the car excitedly, and came back with the tidings that there was an obstruction on the track which would cause the delay of an hour.
The countenances of most of the passengers instantly fell into depths of gloom and despair.
"This is simply intolerable!" muttered one middle-aged man to his companion. "I shall not reach the city before the market closes. It will cost me $2,000 or $3,000."
A physician dropped his newspaper and paced impatiently up and down the car. "An hour late with all my patients!" he exclaimed.
"Are any of them in immediate danger?" asked a bystander.
"No, but an hour late. It is unbearable."
A young girl looked at her companions with the tears in her eyes. "I am going into town for the trimming for my dress. Now it will not be done in time. I shall have to wear my old bonnet to the party."
A young man nervously scolded conductors and brakemen as if they were personally responsible for the delay.
"I am to lecture this afternoon before the Y. M. C. A. as usual, and I am indignant," he explained in hot indignation. "The audience will have to wait twenty minutes."
A young man sat unmoving, his head bent upon his breast, his face set and hard.
"My little boy is dying," he said to some one who questioned him. "I was telegraphed for. I shall not see him alive."
But while, with most of the passengers, there was a secret conviction that the wheels of the universe had stopped because they were delayed in their pursuits of work, one woman sat quiet and tranquil.
She was near the end of a long life of pain and hardship and while she thought the wheels of the universe had stopped because they were delayed in their pursuits of work, one woman sat quiet and tranquil.

A Brave Woman.
The wife of sheriff William Cooper would have been honored in old Spartan days for the pluck which she displayed at the Hart, Michigan, jail, last week. She had opened the jail door to give the prisoners more light when James Waldron, who was awaiting trial for forgery, imagined he had a good chance to escape, so he struck Mrs. Cooper two vicious blows with a heavy stick—one on the forehead and the other on the arm. He fell her to the floor, but when he sprang over her Mrs. Cooper grasped him by the leg and threw him heavily to the stone floor. Both were on their feet in an instant, Mrs. Cooper barring the egress.
The desperate prisoner recovered his sick, but before he could strike another blow the woman hit him with her clenched fist under the chin and knocked him sprawling on the floor. Then she quickly shut the door and locked it. Several desperate criminals would have made their escape from jail if Waldron's scheme had been successful. The blow on Mrs. Cooper's head inflicted a severe scalp wound.

A Hairless Horse.
Now and then a very curious specimen is found among the desert horses of Australia. The oddest of these that I ever saw was a huge, ungainly beast without a hair upon it. It was out of a wild herd and roared in by a station hand, who sold it for a drink and a ring of tobacco to some man riding along the road past the home-stead. The latter taught the hairless horse, taught it a few commonplace tricks and showed it all over the colonies. It was said to have taken $10,000, though he spent it as fast as he got it.
I saw the animal many times. It was rather well shaped when it filled out, and having no mane, but a high neck and crest, it had something the appearance of horses in antique sculptures or bronzes. Its skin was perfectly smooth and shiny and a dark mottled brown in color, and the poor thing seemed very intelligent and docile.—Forest and Stream.

HOW TO STRENGTHEN THE MEMORY OF BOYS.
A teacher in a Sunday school announced that he'd present.
A silver clasped, morocco bound, illuminated Testament.
To every boy who on the coming Sunday could repeat.
From memory a chapter from the Scripture all complete.
When Sunday came he found that only one had gained the prize.
Instead of some other method to devise.
Anxious of Testaments he offered each a ball and bat.
Eve Sunday came eachurch memorized his chapter pat.

SKIN ERUPTION CURED.
One of my customers, a highly respected and influential citizen, who is now absent from the city, has used Swift's Specific with excellent result. He says it cured him of a skin eruption which he had been tormented with for thirty years, and had resisted the curative qualities of many other medicines.

"Miss Pethelbridge," said the embarrassed young man at the other end of the sofa, after a dreary pause in the conversation. "Are you acquainted with my cousin, the Courtwright girls?"
"Courtwright? Courtwright?" replied the young woman dreamily.
"Are you related to anybody of that name, Mr. Pethelbridge? I never should have suspected it."
