The Nadria Aqueduct.

The great Nadria aqueduct, in India, canal 150 feet wide or thereabout across fifteen arches of 60 span. In an account by the correspondent of Engineering, it is stated that the foundations, which are on circular wells, all go down some fifty-five feet below the bed of the river which the aqueduct crosses. The fifteen arches are divided by abutment piers into groups of five spans each, the abutment piers have each two rows of wells and the single piers one row. Thanks to the sim-ple expedient of building the work in a pit dug out of dry land through which the river was subsequently diverted, the work of sinking the 26 wells went on without interruption broughout the year. It is probable that no other well-sinking job has been so systematically worked out— and, indeed, in the beds of active rivers there is no such chance of care-ful administration; for as the river rises and falls, the conditions to be dealt with change completely. The aqueduct carries the Lower Ganges nal across what is known locally as a unddee, i. e., a watercourse that draws its water supply from the plains of Hindostan, and not like what are here known as the rivers proper from the mountains. The anal that goes over the top draws, in ordinary years, a revenue from the land it waters of some £50,000 sterling a year, and a work that secures that revenue at a cost of £300,000 sterling has much need to be pushed on with the utmost expedition. Fortunately, owing to favorable rainfall during the four years that the aqueduct was under reconstruction, the loss of revenue actually experienced was but tenth of the total. Had the case been the other way, the loss of food

The Rise of Water.

The question has often been discus ed whether or not any water passed over the bar during the rise of the tide. The other day we mentioned the matter to one of the Government survey ing corps, and his opinion on the mat-mean low water in the river, which backs the water up entirely. In other words no water passes over the bar, when the tide is higher than the stage of water in the river. But at the pres ent time when the river is about seven feet above low water mark, my opin-ion is, though I have made no study of the matter, that the tide has no influence on water above its own level. Hence, whatever difference there exists between the height of the tide and the water in the river, just that amount crosses the bar."—Cathlamet Gazette.
