aneing kept the men from going over-board. Captain Peterson says that during the entire voyage he enjoyed only a few hours of sleep. The craft was so light that the least wind was strong enough to play havoe with her, and to require his attention. When Captain Peterson arrived at Tahiti the news of his exploit spread, and he became the hero of the hour. The boat was delivered over to the company and Captain Peterson re-ceived a handsome sum for his daring task. He took out master's papers only very recently, and his first essay at navigation has given him a hardearned reputation.
