

The Daily Astorian.

ASTORIA, OREGON: MONDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1890

The English engineer has arrived at Portland, and will at once go over both the completed and surveyed portions of the Astoria & South Coast railroad. It is scarcely possible that after a careful investigation of the proposed line, he can fail to be convinced of the favorable prospects of the road, and he will probably see its advantages so plainly that he will recommend his employers to take the bonds.

Whistling winds Saturday night sang a rather mournful refrain, causing one to feel as if better contented on shore than if tossing over the waves in a heavily laden craft. Yet on shore it was not very disagreeable, only a little too windy, but it is in pleasing contrast to the deep snow which prevails in many portions of this country, as well as in England at this time. Truly a home in Oregon is a good thing to have, either summer or winter, where we have no extremes of heat or cold, but generally a happy medium.

Prominent in the history of our country no day stands forward in grander significance, next to our nation's natal day than does the twenty-second day of December, the anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, which occurred just 270 years ago. Intwoven into the fundamental structure of our glorious government are the noble principles of those old pioneers, whose devotion to liberty and conscientious adherence to right have permeated our entire national system, and through all these long years embracing nearly three centuries, the light of their brilliant example shines brightly to-day, with a lustre undiminished and a purity unstained. The importance of the day accounts for the space given to the subject in these columns, and it is so beautifully given in verse by Mrs. Hemans, that her grand poem is also inserted.

CONFIDENCE among business men and in financial circles is steadily improving, and there is every reason to believe that throughout the whole country business prospects will improve with the coming year. Wall street financiers feel encouraged, and they are sure guides in money matters. As this feeling of confidence and security increases, the beneficial effects will be felt all over the land. Many cities have bonds on the market and as soon as they can be sold, improvements will be commenced, and the money thus distributed to mechanics and laborers will be a benefit to all classes of business. Railroad building at present is almost suspended in various parts of the country in consequence of the tightness of the money market, and the difficulty of placing bonds, all of which will be resumed by the increase of confidence and consequent ease of finances.
