THE OREGONIAN AND BLAINE.

The Oregonian's argument that Blaine was a brilliant creature of circumstances whose name will not live, is absolutely indefensible. Blaine was great in every sense of the word. Why was he a greaman? is the Oregonian's hidden inquiry. What did he do that he should rank with Clay, Webster and Calhoun? Well, he does rank with them, compares favorably with them, will be remembered as long do? He was the author of a series o compromises, and all were futile. He was one of the commissioners of the treaty of Ghent. His name was in his day identified with the cause of home industries. Webster was the expounded of the constitution, and made a few great speeches-two Bunker Hill orations and left a reputation of massive power He had the national instinct and a finliterary faculty. The latter Clay has not Calhoun was a severely dissatisfied man the architect of the machine of the slavpower that sought, first, the control o the general government, and the balance of power in the senate. Calhoun and Webster were in all things contrasts and opposed. The armies on either side dur ing the war of the states were their log ical representatives. It was Webster's brain that formulated the American na tional sentiment that prevailed, steadying public opinion during the war, and tha shown in the crowning mercy of Appo mattox. Webster is firm in his pride o place, and who cares to remember tha the giant had the faults of a giant? H gave his strength to his country, and that is his glory. Take the speeches c Blaine before the people in 1884, and there is but one series of public utterance es from our foremost men that are to b compared with them, and those are Pres dent Harrison's in his tour across th continent. Take Blaine's Bering Sea cor respondence, and it ranks with the greatest of Webster's papers as secretary of state, Take Blaine's volumes of "Twen ty Years in Congress," and name th public man who has produced an equally solid, admirable and durable work, full of all excellencies, and a monumenta structure. Take Blaine's Paris review o Cleveland's tariff reform message, and say whether the re-election of Cleveland four years later has answered it. Take Blaine's speeches during the Harrison campaign, and see how broad the road he blazed for that victory. Take Blaine's letters refusing to be a candidate for the presidency, when he had but to say the word to be nominated by acclamation and compare them with the presidential epistles of Henry Clay. Blaine rejected what Clay demanded. What did Blaine do? He was, along with John Sherman, responsible for the defeat of the third term presidential movement, even when It was in the name of Grant, and it has been given to but few men in any age or country to do republican government better, braver, grander service. What has he done? He has imparted to the repubites on the American continent the idea of a common interest in the world's afit form. His address at the opening of the Pan-American congress will be remercial results; embodied in it is an

REV. STEPHEN D. PEET, Ph. D.

ED TOR OF AMERICAN ANTIQUARIAN,

Author of Animal Efficies and Emblematic

This book treats of the Mound-builders: their occupation, mo es of life, r.ligious systems, tribad divisious and early migratious.

The work contwins descriptions of the earthworks of all classes. The classification of the mounds is made according to their user, whether as village residences, as defenses, as religious structures, or as sacrificial or burnal places. places.

The work contains many illustrations and de crittons of M und-builders' relies, especially pipes and pettery.

The vary of the book is that it contains a comprehensive 'less of the whole field, and sives information about the mounds and relies of all state and districts. It some of a series which is devated to pre-historic America, and perhaps would be regarded as the most interpolation.
