Yesterday at 4 p. m. the residence of our robust and genial townsman, J. M. Miller, was the scene of festivity. A small party of neighbors and friends had been summoned to witness the wedding ceremony that united Mr. Walter D. Sharpe and Miss Grace B. Hendrickson, a young sister of Mrs. Miller. The Oregon educational exhibit for the World's Fair, says the Telegram of Saturday, was started on its journey to Chicago this morning, and Superintendent Pratt heaved a sigh of relief as he watched from the Union depot the train disappear around Albina. He has been busily engaged for several weeks in preparing this exhibit, and has gathered together an exhibit, that will equal any other of the kind. It consists of samples of work, "too numerous to mention," as prepared by the public school children throughout the state, among which will be mentioned maps, charts, clay models, botanical specimens, relief maps in clay, and bound volumes of written work. Several cases of mounted Oregon game birds, furnished by the State Superintendent McElroy, will accompany the exhibit.

Superintendent Pratt will leave for Chicago within a week and personally superintend the management of the exhibit. The space allotted for this exhibit is in the gallery of the big liberal arts building, and is 51x20 feet.

Yesterday's Oregonian says editorially: "As we expected, the fishermen have taken advantage of the failure of the salmon cannery to combine to promote the interests of the packing industry, and have fixed the price at $1.15, nearly double the price charged in the days when the industry was most prosperous. How canners can pay any such price as that put their fish on the market in competition with the Alaska pack no one can explain. Great as is the reputation of the Columbia river salmon, its market price cannot be held up much above the Alaska fish and sustain the demand for it. Intelligence that the total output of young fry from the Clackamas hatchery this season is 3,000,000, about one-half the hatch of a few years ago, also shows wherein a failure to combine and enter upon more extensive artificial propagation is permitting the industry to decline by reason of a failure to maintain the supply of fish. It would be a good thing for the business if the cannery would refuse to pay the price fixed by the fishermen and let their plants lie idle until a reasonable price was fixed, if it were for the entire season. The increase in natural propagation by reason of the greater number of salmon thus permitted to reach the spawning grounds would be a distinct gain, and both the fishermen and the packers would learn a useful lesson."

She left Redondo on March 6th, and had light variable winds till the 4th parallel north latitude was reached, and from thence to port she experienced very disagreeable weather with alternate calms and storms. An important transfer was made in this city Thursday, says the Eugene Register. Henry Weinhard, the millionaire brewer of Portland, purchasing the plant of the cold storage and ice company in this city. The plant is no longer used as a brewery. Mr. Weinhard will use it as a distributing station for this part of the state, making it practically a branch of his immense establishment at Portland. His beer is gaining a wide reputation and is used everywhere. He will ship it in cold storage, filling orders from neighboring towns from here. He will continue the manufacture of ice, and as is customary with everything he undertakes, will keep up the public demand. The most important matter in the transaction is the fact that Portland capital is thus attracted here for investment, all this may be looked upon as the beginning of further transactions of this kind.

Dr. Horace Patchen lies at the point of death, unconscious and paralyzed from the effects of a blow received in a friendly boxing bout with Eugene M. Keys says the Tillamook Headlight.

Some of the boys about town were in L. L. Stillwell's livery stable boxing for sport, and Dr. Patchen and Keys put the gloves on just for fun. Dr. Patchen received a couple of heavy blows on the head and neck, though the blows did not seem hard enough to be serious, and the gloves were almost like pillows. He quit boxing however, saying he had enough, and started to put his coat on, but fell unconscious, and has remained so ever since.

He was carried home and his brother physicians were summoned, and they report him in a very precarious condition. His neck is partially dislocated and there is a hemorrhage on his brain.

An effort to reduce the dislocation of the neck was unsuccessful. It is a very sad affair, and no doubt will cast a damper on the pugilistic ambition of the boys around town.
