ENGLAND'S POSITION. An Interesting Extract from a Recent Speech of Senator Morrell.

the Wealth of Nations," was first in 1776, and received more attention from its pure and felleitous use of the English language than for the nical principles promulgated. England continued to adhere to the most figurous doctrine of protective tariffs for seventy years thereafter, and it was not until 1846, under the premiership of Sir Robert Peel, that even the forn laws were repealed. The Adam Smith theory of free trade was then applied to the changed conditions of the people-it then apparently suited the British-to whom it had become pertinent, almost a necessity, for the reason that their battle of life, from intreasing population, was to obtain bread and meat for their people; but no other people accept or tolerate the isolated and foriorn British example. And yet It was admitted by some of its projectors that it would be a failure unless it should be adopted by other nations. If was a bait for silly foreign gudgeons, to which we are expected to give the first nibble.

The great contest of our American republic, on the contrary, is to find sumers for its annual surplus of food products. Great Britain with its ncreased population must either export men or import their food, and generally does both. Our republic, however, receives the surplus population of the world, but yet, as the new Egypt of Joseph, has enough and to spare, and when famine appears among British subjects, sends them corn by the shipload with money in the mouth of the sacks.

In the career of nations, England, unable from home-grown production to supply her people with wheat and flour for more than one week in four, is but, at great cost of indirect protection, as mistress of the ocean, and being the andom leader of machine-made maufactures, she would still be able to Antain ber power and increased pop- It is the Cheapest, flation, provided these could be found free trade in foreign markets for her exportable manufactures. That is now lier permanent and most perplexing want, and which we, as their first and pears most anxious to offer.
