The little fishing schooner Francise returned to port yesterday morning with a ton of fine halibut in her hold. Captain Olsen reports fishing as only fair at present. His principal hauls were made in the vicinity of the mouth of the river.

at the mouth of the river have been reap-ing a rich harvest since Monday. The weather on the fishing grounds continues good, and fully 80 per cent of the boats are taking advantage of it.

As the water in the river begins to pale the seiners are beginning to get to work again, and by Saturday it is ex-pected that all will be fishing steadily. Oliver is doing better than any other seiner on the river. On Tuesday he delivered two tons of salmon, and yesterday he caught 3,500 pounds. Among these were only 100 pounds of bluebacks. Steel-heads are beginning to put in an appear-ance and this variety of fish is likely to increase in number gradually from this time to the end of the season.

Alaska is to get a little benefit out of the late Trilby craze, according to the P. I. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good. The Seattle paper says: "The new ten-ton schooner Trilby will sail for Cook's inlet, Alaska, in about ten days, H. Schwartz and John Cavanaugh, her owners, having some mining prospects there which they will work for at least a year. Civil Engineer W. Maurice will go also to try to find a pass across the Alaska mountain range, west of the inlet, into the Kusoquim valley, which has never been fully explored."

that the first installment of the machinery and paraphernalia needed for dredg-ing out the waterway and canal, in the shape of a monster Bowers' dredger and thirty-two scows and pontoons, making up a tow of a little over a quarter of a mile in length, has arrived in Seattle. The dredger in the tow is no feet long and thirty-five feet wide, and the largest ever in Puget sound. It is a hydraulic suction dradger, using a rotary exca-vator, drawing the material up by a centrifugal pump and forcing it through a line of pipe to whatever point may be desired to deposite the matter excavated. The company owns a similar but larger dredger, which is now at Portland, but is expected to be taken to the sound within the next six weeks. Both dredgers have done much work on the coast, the larger one having been used in San Diego harbor, and brought up the coast safely boxed up. When so boxed up these dredgers are able to weather the heaviest storms.

The sealing fleet that went from this coast early in the year to Japanese waters has fallen upon evil days, and misfortunes seem to be crowding thick and fast on the various schooners that ventured so far westward. The Emma Louise, with Captain Alexander Mc-Lean in command, called at Hakodate with six of a crew of dismasted Japanese schooner on board. The rescued men said their vessel was wrecked about 300 miles off the land and that they had remained by the dismantled hull until picked up. For ten days they had been without food and water. Captain Mc-Lean set fire to the derelict schooner and Lean set fire to the derelict schooner and remained by her until she sank, so as to prevent her being a danger to other vessels. The Emma Louise reported losing three of her boats while salling. One of them was afterwards picked up by the Therese, another was reported as being safe on the schooner Bonanza, but the crew of the third had not been beard from what the Points salling and in heard from when the Belgic sailed and it was thought that they had been lost, The Josephine, an American schooner, called at Hakodate to repair a leak. One of her seams on the port side opened out while her boats were out, and they had to be hurriedly called in and the vessel heided for land, fearing that the leak would be more dangerous than it proved to be when the schooner was put on the ways. Three men belonging to the schooner Eppinger were cast ashore about twenty-five miles south of Aomori, and they were sent to Hakodate. They said they became separated from the schooner in a fog while hunting, and they were four days in the boat before they made land.
