William Skipton arrived yesterlay after a three weeks' absence, during which he was in California, Texas, Arizona, Colorado, Okiahoma, Ufah and other states. He went to seek his for une, but his returned to Ovegon to remain. It was in Kanaas that he saw u farmer heading a thirty-acre wheat field. Three rounds were made without unloading the header bed, and the highest guess made by those who watched the proceeding was that the whole thirty acres would turn off three header bed loads. In Oklahoma off three header best loads. In Oknahoma he saw mainy fields of wheat on which the grain had reached a height of six or eight inches, and had been so burned by hot winds that the blades had turned almost white. Then corn had been planted in the same field with the dead wheat sounding between the rows. Hot winds, when William was these had also cooked the William was there, had also cooked the corn and it was languishing in the hot sun, lifeless and withou; pride of past or hope of future. En route home, one man said all that Oklahoma needed was moisture and good society and it would be the garden spot of earth. An old man who had spent some time in Oklahoma cruelly rejoined: "Yes, with plenty of moisture and good society h-l would be a lovely place." It was in Arizona that William saw a man mowing hay and every time the sickle bar struck a clod it raised the sickle above the crop of hay. That was the night that made William homesick for Oregon, where the hay sometimes overtops a tail man's head and he heaved a sigh and struck for Webfoot, to live and die.—Corvall.s
