No American citizen, indeed, is worthy of the name, whose bosom is not fired at the perusal of the brilliant exploits of that memorable struggle, which made it possible for the grand old heroes of '76, to affix their names to that document which was forever to break and annihilate the chains of the slave and down-trodden, and make of every man a power unto himself, a potentate and a king. After a day of clouds and mists the sunset yesterday evening was a golden promise of better days to come. Through a rift in the clouds the red sun, like a bail of fire, dropped over a low cloud bank into the sea, leaving behind a gorgeous colored sky and sea. The bright light of the heavens is never more appreciated than after it has been obscured for a number of days, and as all feel more or less gloomy and blue during dark days, so all rejoice even at the mere promise of a bright day.

Very prosperity will surely lead to ruin, and thait, as already stated, we cannot put eway from us, even for a moment, the maxim: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." While the virtues of a Miriades, a Marius, a Cincinnatus, permeate the countries honored by them; while a king of Epirus is compelled to excision of a typical Roman general, that it is easier to turn the sun from its course than that general from the path of honor-such nations are safe. There can be no grave apprehension as long as the sublime purity of a Washington, can be no grave apprehension as long as the sublime purity of a Washington, an Adams and a Patrick Henry, is still reverred and emulated. It is only when sortid passions have seized the souls of mso, when armies can be overawed and bought, when the sceptre of a Roman emptre, fixelf, can be knocked down to the highest bubber, that we begin to inquire for the causes of these distators. We have seen But why particularize: We said turope the whole of the once civilized Europe the whole of the once civilized Europe enveloped in darkness, and harbarous hordes swarming unchallenged over the desert they have made. For centuries languishing and bleeding, we behold her at the feet of her enemies; the dark age, with its breath of poison and with its chains of bondage, has well night destroyed her intellect, her aspirations, her life. That individual nations on the verge of destruction may repain, in a massaure, their former importance, is not here attempted to deny; but how aphere attempted to deny; but how ap-palling or humiliating her sacrifices, how heartrending her sufferings, her wretch-edness. Stripped of her gausiy vestments, the once proud nation may see herself the circle proud nation may see herself forced to wallow for ages in the mire and slough of despond, harmessed in her makedness to the corrupting harlots of treason and debacuhery, her kife all but spent ere she may recover attempth enough to lift her bony finger in revenge and smite her enslavers!

Before 1881 the sky of the American re-public was cloudless; for her the stars of the firmament shone with a brilliancy so serone as to make glad the hearts of the beholders. The farms of the land were as blooming gardens; the hum of the loom was as sweet music to the heart of honest labor, and the village maiden dreamt only of the joyous day when she might call him her own forever, to whom her troth had been plighted! How sud-denly, we know, this peaceful scene was changed, and how convulsed became this fair and heretofore prosperous country. As we took back, the sky is overcast, and lurid clouds overhang the horizon.

A most hideous hurricane, as it were, has broken loose from its moorings, and consternation and dismay everywhere meet the eye of the beholder! The homes of unity and peace are shattered into fragments. The spectacle is truly heartrending. With blanched faces and trembling limbs, with closed eyes and deaf ears, willingly would we turn from it if we could, but we cannot. For even through the reging storm we are forced to hear the wailing and the weeping and the crash of tottering monuments, reared by the hand of patriotism to fame and honor. And are we going to allow ourselves, with returning prosperity, to entirely forget this fearful lesson? w.dows and orphans of those days, it is true, have accepted the sucrifice with a herolam never, perhaps, equaled in the history of the human race. But for many a year still to come, by the sweat of the brow, we must labor on and on, the shoulder to the wheel, our hands blistered with toll, if we would lighten the penderous weight of the pension roll with its annual two hundred millions of treasure.

France, under the rule of the last Napoleon, resting unconcerned under the laureds of the first empire, had come to acquire opulence and importance among nations. Her commerce and her varied industries had brought with them ease and comforts innumerable. Throughout ther dominions, in her cities, towns, villages, the people basked in the sunshine of a prosperity never before ut-tained. Paris had been transformed into the most boudful city of modern times. Her boulevards were brilliant, her cafes irresistable, and luxury and fashion were at their height. The third Napoleon fancted that his army and the spirit of the times were in keeping with the at their firesides, from their brides' lips deed he was powerful enough to cope or from the songs of their bards and min-with any adversary in the world. Not strels. thait seeming prosperity brought Franc-to the very brink of irreparable disso lut.on. Obdivious of the necessary safe guards required at such times, the soft ness and abandon of the Parisian life that permeated her empire with its vol-uptuousness, its "cafe dansant," and the can-can, had proved enough to sap the energy and vigor of this self-fancied, inv.norble people and to fling it from the pinnacte of military resown to sue hum-bly for peace at the feet of the more sturdy German.

France had forgisten her vig lance, and rence her humiliation. And without referring to other examples, it may be said that these na tions the the Biblical foolish vrgins, had taken their tamps, but had taken no oil with them. Again I say, let us not be deluded. Let us take swarning. Do not these examples conclusively teach us that in the day of prosperity lurks tree of destruction; and that if we cannot crush it in its birth we may no longer be able to cope with the eigeantic proportions of its growth. And that unless we are ever on the alent, we may find ourselves only recklessly following some new born Pharach into the yawning waters of the enguifing sea; that we may be but entering graduality, though surely, into the intricute mizes of that deletul kingdom, where mourning and etsenal pain have replaced all joys forever, and over whose portals the great poet has written: "Leave every hope behind, oh ye that enter."

Thus, in spite of the fact that we are living in an age of rand advancement in times so enlightened that events follow each other in so quick a succession that each other in so quick a succession that, meteoritie, they dazzle our senses, in an era made all ablaze with Lght, hi which the printing press, steam, the elastric force and the breath of science are busity engaged humanizing the heart of every race and of every creed.
