Associations of bankers now exist in thirty states of the Union and have a years since the first of these bodies was organized, but most of those in existence date their origin since 1890. Three years ago the banks of the state of New York formed an association of this character in which 389 banks are enrolled, while the savings banks of the state have also assoclated themselves with a membership of 100 institutions. The interest and usefulness of such bodies has been amply proved, and it is now understood that active steps are being taken to extend their sphere and increase their utility by the organization of a national bankers' association. In this movement the New York association is taking the lead. a committee having been appointed by it to secure expressions of opinion as to the proposed federation from the var-

The press of San Francisco generally, and a number of the daily newspapers of this city in particular, are making serious mistakes in their policies.
