The rather mixed composition of som of Albert Edward's house parties reminds a writer in the St. James Gazette of a good story concerning Poole, the famous London tallor. Mr. Pocle was a most accommodating gentleman, and was often invited to the house of "the great." When staying with a crtain nobleman he was asked one morning by his host what ne thought of the party who had assembled at the table the night before. "Why, very pleasant, indeed, your grace, but per haps a little mixed." "Hang it all, Poole responded the jovial peer, "I couldn't have all tailors."
